He is forty-nine years of age, stands about five feet six inches, is stout and well made, has a pretty large head, of great breadth from ear to ear; it is covered bountifully with strong grey hair, with beard, moustache, and whiskers to match. His cheek bones are slightly elevated, and his black eye, under sharply-arched eyebrows, is clear and piercing. Altogether, his features are intelligent and expressive, denoting decision, energy and ability. Tantia is a Brahmin, and the Brahminical cord is always very religiously placed over the ear when he goes out of his tent to prepare his meals. He performs his ablutions, goes through his genuflexions, and prepares and devours his khanna once a day, with all the strictness and religious ceremonies of his caste, having members of the Brahmin caste there to attend him.

Tantia was brought from his tent to the fort by an escort of the 3d Bengal Europeans; and then a considerable square was formed, with the gallows in the centre. Tantia had expressed some anxiety to know his fate, and to have it expeditiously executed. Consequently at twelve (noon) it was intimated to him that he was to be executed that evening. He again feelingly expressed a wish, that, as they were about to take his life, the government would see to his babe at Gwalior. Major Meade read the charges and the sentence. The mistree then knocked off the leg-irons. Tantia Topee mounted the ricketty ladder with as much firmness as handcuffs would allow him, was then pinioned and his legs tied, he remarking that there was no necessity for these operations, and he then deliberately put his head into the noose, which being drawn tight by the executioner the fatal bolt was drawn. He struggled very slightly, and the "menters" were called to drag him straight. A sergent of the 3d Bengals acted as hangman. The body remained hanging for the remainder of the evening. After the troops left a great scramble was made by officers and others to get a lock of hair.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

M. de Lesseps has commenced the excavation for the canal across the Isthmus of Suez. The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer writes in relation to this great enterprise, as follows:

The philosopher, undismayed by a thousand opposing interests, has gone practically to work. After a careful reconnoissance of the line, he has returned from Suez to the Mediterranean, and on the 25th of last month established his camp at the spot selected for the northern terminus of the canal. He was accompanied by the engineer-in-chief of the Egyptian Government, by his own corps of assistants, and by one hundred and fifty native workmen. Thus attended, and having hoisted the Egyptian flag with certain deferential ceremony, M. de Lesseps addressed a little speech to the assembly—he lifted a mattouk and struck the first blow into the sands. "Each one of you, my friends," he added, turning to the Egyptian workmen grouped around, "each of you will lend your arm to the work. Remember that it is not merely that you dig into the earth for your daily bire. Your labor is about to bring prosperity to your homes, to your country. High honor to your Effendi, Mohammed Said Pasha, the august creator of our enterprise! May he live many, many years!" The words were received with shouts; and the men, seizing their tools, rushed to the work "as to the trenches of a siege."

The Egyptian Government, notwithstanding the British opposition, have certainly befriended the enterprise. The work is begun, therefore, under auspices of a better nature than had been feared. Capt. Fym and Mr. Robert Stephenson, denounce the project as that of a mad-man. Sixty-five million of dollars, they maintain, are about buried in sand forever, and their voices are lifted in the scientific world against an act of stupendous folly. The distance, they tell us, from the Mediterranean point (the Bay of Pelusium, the birth-place, let me add, of the astronomer Ptolemy, let us therefore augur well for science) to the Red Sea, at Suez, is ninety-two miles—ninety-two miles of moving sand, without a drop of fresh water throughout.

The canal, to be 330 feet wide and 21 feet deep, is to traverse this distance. The levels of the two seas are ascertained, they add, to be identical. The canal, therefore they argue, will be stagnant. To prevent the sides of the excavation from falling in they must be eased with stone; and to prevent the excavation from being refilled by the clouds of sand, the whole length of the canal must be defended by parapets. At the Mediterranean terminus there is no harbor. The engineers design to build one, therefore, extending six miles out to sea in parallel stone piers. This artificial harbor, they maintain, is wholly impracticable, from the nature of the bottom, the mud being so deep that no foundation can be laid. A similar harbor, extending two miles out is designed for Suez. Stones for the latter are to be imported from Arabia Petrea, and for the former from Cyprus.

The tolls to be demanded, (at the rate of $2 50 a ton,) if paid, say the English opponents of the work, by all the ships of all nations that now navigate around the African continent, would not suffice for a profit upon the outlay of $65,000,000, even if this sum should be enough for the construction. A ship of 2000 tons would pay $5000 for passing through the canal; the distance saved being 6000 miles. Her freight average but seven and a half dollars a ton for the outward or inward voyage. The canal tolls, therefore, would be equivalent to one-third of the present rates of freight, which are $5 for the outward and $10 for the homeward voyage.

Such are some of the English objections to undertaking the Suez Canal. In face of them $65,000,000 are subscribed for it on the Continent, and the work is begun.

COUNT BUOL AND COUNT RECHBERG.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times writes: At 11 o'clock yesterday morning Count Buol ceased to be Minister of Foreign Affairs, but it is not yet known whether he tendered his resignation, or whether he was requested by the Emperor to retire from office. It is said that the policy of Austria is about to undergo a complete change. Count Buol, who has a very strong bias in favor of England, was so deeply impressed with the conviction that what was bad for Austria, Prussia and Germany, was also bad for the British Empire, that he confidently believed he would have the moral if not the material support of her Majesty's Government, should this country be involved in a war with France. The assistance which Austria claims from England was that she should declare to the French Government that the Adriatic must be considered a strictly neutral sea. As Lord Malmesbury declined to do this, the enemies of Count Buol made a violent attack on him, and succeeded in persuading the Court that, as nothing was to be expected or even hoped from England, it would be wise to make peace with Russia. At this moment Count Buol left office, the first step toward a reconciliation was taken, and it is probable that a good understanding will soon be established between the Austrian and Russian empires. Austria will, as a matter of course, be obliged to make many concessions, but the chances are that they will be at the expense of Turkey rather than at her own. If things should progress favorably between the St. Petersburg and Vienna Governments, we shall soon see the Kreuz Zeitung party in power again in Prussia, and when that is the case the re-establishment of the Holy Alliance may reasonably be expected.

While Austria is in this terrible dilemma, England announces that she intends to maintain an armed neutrality, and Prussia tells Germany that the moment for action has not yet arrived. Under such circumstances is it wonderful that Count Buol has been sacrificed in order to propitiate Prince Gortschakoff, who has repeatedly declared that a reconciliation between Russia and Austria is impossible, "so long as the man who congratulated Louis Napoleon on the taking of Sabastopol is one of the official advisers of His Majesty, the Emperor, Francis Joseph?"

The Count as a statesman, was the decided adversary of every violent measure, and he never attempted to arrive at his object by extreme means. In the present conflict he certainly was opposed to making any serious concession to Italy; but, at the same time, he considered war the most dangerous mode that Austria could employ to extricate herself from her difficult position. His plan was while maintaining intact all the rights of Austria to lead the great powers, by negotiations, to such an arrangement as might render of no avail the projects which France had conceived in favor of Italy. He invariably opposed the military party, and in his policy always acted on the old German adage, 'Gain time, gain everthing.' His successor, Count de Rechberg, is a zealous partizan of Austrian supremacy in Germany, and a not less ardent champion of the principles of the Romish concordat. All his conduct at Frankfort as delegate of Austria, leads to the belief that he will not imitate, with respect to Germany and Prussia, the marked prudence of his predecessor; and no one need be astonished to find before long the Austrian Cabinet, under his direction, making direct propositions to the Germanic Diet, without paying any attention to what Prussia may think of such a step.

GEORGE WASHINGTON A REJECTED SUITOR.

A writer in the New York Century says of the lady who won Washington's young heart, and whose father rejected the tall young soldier because he had not a carriage for his daughter to ride about in:

I shall go back in her life a number of years, and speak of the event which has made her name one of curious interest. Before she became Mrs. Edward Ambler she was called Mary Cary. Her father was Wilson Cary, Esq., of "Celeys," in the county of Elizabeth City, descended from the noble family of Hunsdon, in England. His relative, Col. Archibald Cary, of "Ampthill," in Chesterfield, was, at his death the heir-apparent to the Earldom. The worthy old gentleman seems, from all we know of him, to have been as proud as the Courcys or the Somersets, and to have thought his family the noblest in the land. He lived in great state, with chariot and horses, plate and velvet and embroidery—a worthy of the old school, fully satisfied with the "order of things," and enjoying serenely the good gifts of Providence. His beautiful daughter was a great heiress, and had many suitors—the accident which befel one of them has made her remembered in many books. He was a young man of very high character, a relative of G. W. Fairfax, Esq., who lived at "Belvair," on the Potomac; and here he met Miss Cary, who came to visit Mrs. Fairfax, her elder sister. The young man at once proceeded to fall in love, which he did with an ardor characteristic of his nature. When Miss Cary went back home to Celeys, on James River, he followed her like a courageous gallant, and laid open seige to the fair fortress. In the good old times, however, something more was necessary than the consent of the young lady, and so the youth duly asked a private interview, with the awful old lord of the manor, who listened to him silently throughout.

When the lover had finished, Mr. Cary rose, made him a low bow, and said that if this was young Mr. Washington's errand at "Celeys," his visit had better terminate; his daughter "had been accustomed to ride in her own chariot." And with this allusion to the poor condition of the younger son, the interview terminated. Young Washington bowed and went away, and in due time married "Martha Dandridge Custis, who "resembled Miss Cary," says my authority, "as much as one twin sister ever did another."

But the old tradition does not end here. Many years fled away—Mary Cary was Mrs. Ambler—and her discarded suitor was the man who had just received the sword of Cornwallis at Yorktown; whom the whole civilized world hailed as greatest among the great, "the foremost man," not only of America, but of "all this world." He passed through the old metropolis, Williamsburg, at the head of his victorious troops, and the people were crazy with joy and adoration almost. The vast multitudes nearly prevented his horse from proceeding—the calm statue on horseback passed on serenely. All at once he perceived at a window, or in the crowd, his old love, Mary Cary. He raised his sword and saluted her profoundedly. She fainted.

THE AMERICAN TREATY WITH CHINA.

Hon. Mr. Reed, late Minister to China, in his address at his public reception in Philadelphia, the other day, said:

Of the American treaty signed on the 18th of June, I am glad to have a chance of speaking. It has been adopted and ratified by my Government, and with its privileges and restraints, is now the law of both lands. Its provisions regulating the public correspondence of the two nations, and requiring the deposit of the treaty at Pekin, and an official promulgation, put an end for ever to that delegation of duty with reference to foreigners to distant provinces and subordinate provincial officials. It contains the first concession of the right to go to the capital, that has in modern times been made to a nation of the West not tributary—for in the Russian treaty there was but the recognition of an ancient right, and it was in the form and under limitations my judgment yet approves, and which, I venture to hope and to foretell, unless Pekin is doomed to be a new Constantinople, will ultimately be adopted by all, as it has been by Russia and France. It recognized Christianity, and secured the full immunity of missionary effort. It protected Christian converts. It facilitated the purchase of real estate by foreigners. It reduced the tonnage dues. It settled the vexed question of the place of official intercourse, at the open ports and cities, out of which had arisen Sir John Davis's little war of 1847, and which had protracted Sir John Bowing's bigger conflict, (not yet I fear ended,) of 1856. It opened new ports. It regulated in great detail, after the benefit of twelve years experience, the commercial relations of the East and West, and, taking for its model the British treaty of 1842, by very comprehensive "most favored clauses," (which the Chinese gladly assented to,) gave us every thing that might at any time be granted to other nations. Of such a treaty, made in peace and friendliness, without an unkind word or thought, without a threat, or a pang, or a scar, adopted and approved by China and my own country, I have no reason to be ashamed.

American cotton goods, which, unlike the British fabrics, have appreciated in China since 1844, are to be imported at a lower rate than the five per cent. ad valorem scale adopted in Lord Elgin's treaty. The sure, if not rapid, increase of their consumption, especially in the North of China, may be relied on, and if the really great features of Lord Elgin's treaty, (for which he deserves all praise,) the regulation of the interior transit duties, be, as I think it will be, a success, there is every reason to hope for a large increase of Western fabrics.

LOUIS XVII.

There are stranger things than fiction, even in modern times, but people will hardly be prepared for the startling announcement which was asserted at a coroner's inquiry held yesterday, that the Dauphin of France, the unfortunate son of Louis XVI., did not, as history states die, "on the 9th of June, 1795, in the prison of the Temple, after a miserable confinement of three years," but that he expired in a London street cab but a few days since, and that the body upon whom inquest was being held was no other than that Dauphin, Louis XVII. of France. A person under the name of Augustus Menes, has for some years past resided with his family at 35 University Street, Tottenham-court road, where he followed the avocation of a professor of music. It appeared that the deceased, who was in his seventy-fifth year, was suddenly taken ill when near his own residence, and as medical assistance could not be immediately procured, he was conveyed without delay in a cab to the University College Hospital close by, but he was dead before arriving at the institution, the cause of the death being, as the post mortem examination distinctly proved, disease of the heart. It seems that the deceased's conversation for the last thirty years, when he first made his family acquainted with the strange story, has been to the effect that he was the Dauphin who was supposed to have died in the Temple; and while the deceased bore a strong likeness in the face to the Bourbon family of France, his family further assert that he had certain marks on his person which the hapless infant King had. He had always himself desired to keep the matter secret from the world, but his family have now expressed their determination to publish the whole facts connected with his marvelous history. THE DUKE DE CHARTRES.

This young Prince of the House of Orleans is a brevet lieutenant in the Piedmontese hussars, and is in the division of General Chiablini. The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligence, says: On the night of the 10th he was sent upon a reconnoissance, and acquitted himself gallantly. His report was delivered next morning, when he received opportunely from his uncle, the Duke d'Aumale, a present of two English chargers. It is related of him further, that when asked by a brother subaltern if he really intended to make the campaign against Austria, he replied: "I am here to learn my profession, and I have nothing to do with the causes or secrets of the war. I am an officer in the army of a King who has shown kindness to my family. I shall fight moreover side by side with the soldiers of France, and this is as much as I care to know." He was born in November, 1840.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

THE PEW QUESTION.

The Pew Question has been a matter of practical interest among our Virginia brethren of late—a powerful Methodist Church having recently been built in Petersburgh. The Richmond Advocate has been full of the discussion. Dr. Rosser, the Editor, formerly an out-and-out free-seat advocate, has modified his views somewhat under the present pressure, and, while contending for free-seats as a rule, admits the rightfulness of pews as an exception. He prays that the exception may never become the law. "Lead us not into temptation." Free-seats and itinerancy—these are essential to Methodism. Pews and congregationalism—these are not Methodistic—even as an exception.

A paragraph has appeared in the newspapers, stating the results of the auction of pews in "the Church of that popular preacher, the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, pastor of the Plymouth Church, Brooklyn." The auction was, it seems, conducted much as Barnum put up the places at Jenny Lind's concert. The result was that many of the poorer members of the Church were actually deprived of seats in their own place of worship.

Mr. Henry Ward Beecher is at the trouble, "in answer to a remonstrance," of defending it, not without ingenuity and completeness. He says: "A Church, when it deals with material things, is subject to the same commercial law as any other body. Buying and selling in a Church are just the same as in a store. Both should be honest and equitable, and, if they are, it is all sham to talk of the Church being too sacred for worldly things. Whenever a Church comes to that part of its business which is secular and requires commercial wisdom, then it must stand, just like any other honest concern, subject to all equitable laws of matter and money. The pews must be sold and taxed, or rented every year, and this must be done publicly, that all may have a chance; and if the pews are not much sought after, there will be but little trouble or complaint. But if the pews are fewer than the applicants—if ten men want seats when but one can be accomodated—how are we to select which shall have them? Shall there be a perpetual scramble? Then the strongest shall get them. Shall they be rented privately? Then the alert and shrewd shall get them. Shall they be rented openly and in fair competition? Then, inevitably, they must follow the commercial law, and the man who wants them most, and has the means of paying the most, must have them."

To this, the London Saturday Review makes the following reply, which we give to the readers of the Advocate for what it is worth: This is exhaustive, or, as the vulgar would say, goes the whole hog. This is political economy in excelsis. You must sell religion in the dearest market, and when it is perfect, there will be no cheap market. Religion being only a commercial article the cheap religion is, by the force of the terms, worthless. A man who cannot sell his doctrine has no more right to be a teacher in religion than a tradesman has to open a store of unsaleable rubbish.

One wants, of course, a few correctives of the old fashioned book which is usually thought to contain the axioms and principles of religion! How hardly shall they that have riches enter the kingdom of heaven, says some One. How hardly shall they that have not riches enter into Mr. Beecher's temple, says Mr. Beecher. Without money and without price, is the offer of the Evangelical prophet—the best places for the best price, and no pew no salvation, says the Evangelical seat-seller. But further: in religion, as in other things, to understand it, we must look at it only in its perfection. We can only really judge of any work of nature or art in its highest shape. When we talk of the nature of man, we look at a man in his perfection—when we discuss a monarchy or a republic, we only look at its theoretical and abstract completeness. So with religion. Henry Ward Beecher is, of course, the great ideal towards which all religious teachers ought to aspire and are tending. All religious teachers, then, being supposed to be perfect—all being as they ought to be, duplicates and repetitions of Mr. Beecher—his congregation is to be regarded as the noble type and example of all Christian Churches. And what a beautiful and symmetrical organization—none but the very best society and its cream's cream forming the truly religious. The Upper Ten thousand and the Truly Pious actually identical! The man who has naught would be naughty, and Christian graces and acquirements would be the natural result of a balance at one's banker's. To keep up riches and to secure treasures in the Heavenly Bank would be only a single operation in the Stock market, and to be a Millionaire and a Saint at the same time would only require the same qualifications.

The Church, Romans tell us, is but one in its earthly and heavenly aspects. The kingdom of God is Heaven and the kingdom of God on earth are but functions and forms of the same great Ideal Community. Man's warrant to claim the former is his adoption into the latter. The Church here is not only the preparation for, but actually the rehearsal and contemplation of, the coming glory in Heaven. Now, what a very odd place Heaven would be if Mr. Beecher's account of the Heaven upon earth, which his Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, must be, is to be taken as the type of Heaven! Heaven, that is, contains none but people well to do in this world—none but those who can afford to pay the best prices for the best places—with many mansions, like the many pews, but all to be put up at auction to the highest bidder. The Heaven that is to be, like the Heaven that is, obeys just the same laws as any other body—with the power of the Purse, instead of the power of the Keys, and its Apostles fighting with silver weapons, instead of the poverty which was to subdue the world. One now begins to understand why Chrysostom was usually styled golden-mouthed, and we begin to feel what a "silvery-voiced preacher" really means.

If, as Mr. Beecher neatly and concisely states it, "it is all a sham to talk of the Church being too sacred for worldly things," then, of course, the old saying and promise that to the poor the Gospel is preached, means that to the rich the Gospel, according to Beecher, is preached; and that the old Protestant dislike of pardons, indulgences, and masses for money, was a mistake. That system which boldly said, "No Penny no Paternoster," came up to Mr. Beecher's standard of "an honest concern, subject to all the equitable laws of matter and money." The laws of matter and money—the law which gives painted windows and gilded mosaics to the religion of the rich, as it assigns plate glass and mahogany counters to the Regent Street shops, but which keeps the contemptuous of religion and the tub-preachers and the street mall for Shoreditch and Whitechapel—the law which would have given St. Paul kid gloves and a brougham, and which ought to have said, "My Father's house is the house of those who bid highest for the pews," which ought to have proclaimed, "Blessed are the rich in pocket, for yours is the kingdom of heaven and of Mr. Beecher"—which ought, in following the inevitable commercial law, to have said, "In my Father's house are many mansions, and in Mr. Beecher's Church are many pews, and happy are they who rent them,"—such is the new and improved regime which, it seems, is to supersede the obsolete moralities of an more ancient dispensation.

"NICODEMUS SEATS"—"COMMON SENSE."

At a recent noon-day prayer-meeting in the Old South Chapel, Boston, the lesson for the morning was Christ's interview with Nicodemus. It was noticed that there are in many cases, the same disposition to seek the covert of the night to come to Jesus, as there was in the Jewish ruler. When S. V. S. Wilder built a Church on Bolton Hills, as you entered the door of the vestry, seats were made with high backs, so that persons could come in and not be seen, but could hear. A person asked him why he built those seats? He replied, that they were "Nicodemus seats," where people could come in by night and hear, and not be seen.

The late Mr. George J. Homer, once said, that had there not been a gallery in the Church, he should never have been saved. He went up into the gallery, and took his seat in one corner, and heard the word that took hold on his soul.

In another case, a man in the country, who had never attended a night meeting, went to a meeting in a private house, crept up the front stairs and got out of sight. But the Lord reached him even there. For many years past he has been an officer in an Orthodox Church.

In another case, a meeting was held in the second story of an unfinished house, and in the first story there was a lumber room, in which there was a potash kettle. A man crept into this out of sight, and the word of God reached him. This man has been a member of an Evangelical Church thirty years. Those who find Jesus by night are soon constrained to own him in open daylight.

"Take the world as you find it," should be one of the principles of ministers of the gospel, and of all who wish to be useful. Become all things to all men, in order to save some. Those preachers and people who are "set" and bigotted in their views about matters not involving principle and conscience, forget that "he that winneth souls is wise." Some preachers think that those who have to be visited by the pastor, in order to profit by his preaching, promise but little. They do not know what they are talking about. Others think that because a penitent, coming forward for prayers, chooses to sit, instead of kneeling, he is not much in earnest. Such men have to knock their heads against many a wall of hard experience before they learn "a small modicum of common sense."

Talking about common sense brings to mind an amusing anecdote of the late Rev. Dr. Daniel Baker of the Presbyterian Church. At a well-known city, where he was holding a protracted meeting, and where a powerful revival was in progress under his ministry, as was usual with him, all denominations had united with him and the meeting was held in the Methodist Church.

When the revival was at its height, and but little preaching was necessary—Christians laboring with a zealous tenderness for the conversion of their friends, and penitents numerous at the altar of prayer—there came along a young preacher, fresh from his theological seminary, where he had but a short time before graduated. He called on Dr. Baker, and was invited to preach, and contribute his youthful zeal and fire to the advancement of the good work.

The young man consented, and, regarding the "precious doctrine" of the decrees of eternal "election and reprobation" as being "most wholesome and full of comfort" to "the elect;" and, his recent thesis at graduation being an elaborate defence and enforcement of that doctrine—the best prepared sermon he had in the world—he, naturally enough, chose it for the occasion. For two hours he read his testimony to the astonished, staring, and, at length, indignant congregation.

The Doctor agonized, unutterably, save in suppressed groans. But he survived. Rising to conclude with an exhortation—"bring up the rear"—and save the day if possible, he uttered himself, in substance, as follows: "The dear young brother's sermon, my dear brethren, was all very well, but—most unfortunate, just at this time. But, my dear brethren, a happy thought occurs to me. (tapping the top of his bald and shining crown with one of his fingers.) A happy thought! Let us pray"! After all had kneeled the Doctor addressed "the throne of heavenly grace" that they might "obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." Among other petitions, he is reported to have uttered the following: "O thou God of all grace! If it be consistent with thy purposes of wisdom and mercy, be pleased, in thine infinite condescension and goodness, to grant to this, our dear young brother, a small modicum of common sense!" Whether the prayer was answered or not, we are not informed, as the young man did not stay long enough to admit of further observation.

A PORTRAIT OF THE POPE.

Pius IX. looks older than he is; his stature is diminutive; he is obese, and his health is threatening. His paternal and sleepy features give an idea of kindness and lassitude; there is nothing imposing about them. Pius IX. performs his part in the grand public representations of the Catholic Church with only secondary ability. The believers who have come a long way to contemplate him at mass, are astounded to see him taking a pinch of snuff while surrounded by the blue wreaths of incense. In his leisure hours he plays billiards, gentle exercise having been recommended him by his physicians. He believes in God. He is not only a true Catholic, but a bigot. In his enthusiasm for the Virgin Mary he has invented a useless dogma, and raised a tasteless monument that disgraces the Piazza di Spagna. The character of this worthy old man is a compound of devotion, geniality, vanity, weakness, and obstinacy, with a dash of peevish rancor, which is perceptible now and then. He bestows his blessing with great unction, but only grants a pardon with reluctance; he is a good priest, but an unsatisfactory monarch. We do not believe him to be infallible in temporal matters. He expresses himself tolerably in French. The failure of all he undertakes, and three or four accidents which have happened in his presence, have given rise to a strong prejudice against him among the lower classes of Rome. They imagine that the Vicar of Christ is a jettatore—that he has the "evil eye." When he drives along the Corso, the women plump down on their knees, but with their thumb and index they make the sign supposed to destroy the charm, under cover of their mantilla. It is certain that the Italian question would be greatly simplified if there were no Pope at Rome, and that the hatred of the Mazzinians is reprehensible in so far as it is personal. After having been two years the lion of Europe, he was compelled to evacuate, at the shortest notice, his place in the Quirinal. Now he sulks with his people, with the French and with himself. The murmurs of his conscience are stifled by his remembrance of 1847, which is kept constantly before his eyes, and by the fear of revolution, which is constantly dinned into his ears.

Mr. Joseph Charless, of St. Louis, a highly-esteemed merchant, and member of the Presbyterian Church, was murdered in a most horrible manner—shot down in the street without warning—by a man named Thornton, against whom Mr. Charless had testified in an indictment for embezzlement. The good man lived long enough to express forgiveness for his murderer and comfortable hope of heaven.

SKETCH OF GARIBALDI.

A native of Piedmont, Garibaldi, like his father and grandfater, in early life became a sailor, and performed numerous voyages in the Mediteranean and Levant, until having joined the secret society of Italian patriots, he was condemned to death, and escaped from Genoa to Marseilles in disguise. In one of his early voyages he had visited Rome.

Having subsequently spent a few months at Rio Janeiro, and learned the condition of the Republic of Rio Grande, which had rebelled against the tyranny of the Brazilian Empire, he embarked with General Rosetti in a small vessel to go to their assistance, and captured a few consting vessels on his way, under the authority of the flag of the new State. He was soon after attacked in the Parana, by a Brazilian vessel of much superior force, and laid senseless on his deck by a shot in the neck, which rendered him unconscious until after the repulse of the enemy. Here commenced his military life, which continued fourteen years in South America, and through the revolutions of 1848-9 in Italy, and afforded a variety of scenes of alternate trial, success and disaster seldom paralleled. A chief object at which he constantly aimed in his romantic South American career, was to train to arms Italians who were in exile in those regions, and to prepare them to fight for their own country.

Such was his success, that, although he commenced under many adverse circumstances, "The Italian Legion" soon began to reap laurels, and at length took the front rank in the armies for discipline, daring, constancy and success. In his service in Italy during the last revolution he had many of his old soldiers in his ilies, and doubtless some of the survivors must be with him now, to struggle against the Austrians.

Some of the most interesting passages in Garibaldi's life relates to his wife. He married a lady of extraordinary qualities, a native of one of the States of South America. She was trained to horsemanship and the most athletic habits which prevailed among the females of those countries. Though, like him, noble-hearted, affectionate, and disinterested, she also possessed a similar degree of personal courage and fortitude, which have seldom been displayed, and still more rarely depicted, by any authentic pen. After her marriage she accompanied him in his battles, by sea and land; and although usually unarmed, and keeping at his side only as his companion, she sometimes aided in his most desperate conflicts, by dealing out powder, loading guns, and even firing them at the enemy.

The sufferings which she endured among the mountains in times of adversity and seasons of tempests were severe and almost incredible. The short account of her escape from a Brazilian guard, after capture in an engagement, and her journey of several days and nights, on horseback and alone through wild forests; swimming swollen torrents on her way by holding to the mane or the tail of her horse, is exceeded only by the sad narrative of her death in 1849, on the banks of the Po, when, after resolutely accompanying Garibaldi on his return from Rome, she landed with him in one of the boats in which he was seeking to reach Venice, then the only place in Italy which held out against the enemy.

Garibaldi declined the proffered honors of a public reception, on his arrival at New York, in 1849; urgently recommending to his exiled countrymen here to apply themselves to such honest employment as they could obtain for their independent support, "not hesitating at accepting the most humble—even sweeping the streets." As soon as his feeble health was restored, in strict consistency with his precepts, he set the example of engaging in daily labor, in the candle manufactory of his friend and countryman, Signor Meucci, on Staten Island. While thus employed by day, he continued at evening, for some time, to add to his manuscripts, at the request of the American friend to whom he had committed them; until he found it necessary to intermit his literary labors in consequence of his physical fatigue.

He afterwards spent several years in commanding commercial vessels between Peru and China, and then returned to Piedmont, his native country, where he was allowed to reside by the Government, and where he superintended the education of his two young sons, and endeavored to colonize the little island of Capre, on the coast of Sardinia, which he had purchased with money bequeathed to him by his brother. When the present war was threatened, he was placed in command of a division of the army of Piedmont, and assigned to an important post on the left wing, where his standard has been joined by thousands of the most enthusiastic Italian soldiers, viz: the volunteers who have flocked in arms, from every part and corner of the Peninsula.

The portraits of Garibaldi, we learn, are in every window and at every print-stall in Sardinia, generally seen placed between those of Napoleon III. and Victor Emanuel. The favorite costume of the guerrilla hero is a cloak worn a la Byron; but instead of the Calabrian visage which one expects to see, with swarthy skin and long, flowing locks, Garibaldi is said to be almost fair in complexion, and of a somewhat dreamy expression of countenance. His popularity is as unbounded as his bravery is indisputable. "All who ever visited him," says one writer, "pronounce him to be every inch a gentleman. His soldiers follow him with unbounded confidence, and he is himself always the first under fire. All are anxious to serve him, but Garibaldi is nice in the choice of his men. Such is the prestige attached to his name that 4000 young men of Brescia are enrolled and ready to march and join him the moment he appears. His integrity is unquestionable and his loyalty perfect. He will not permit the smallest breach of discipline, and his severity in that respect is such that, when organizing his little army at Savigliano, he was with difficulty prevailed upon not to order a volunteer to be shot for stealing a ring worth three francs. The ambition of tourists and correspondents alike is to gain the camp of Garibaldi and follow his movements, but these have been, as yet, rather too swift or too secret to keep up with, and we have had no direct communication from his head-quarters.

THE GERMANIC CONFEDERATION.

This Confederation, says the Prayume, was created by the treaty of Vienna in 1815. Its members are the sovereign princes and free cities of Germany, including the Emperor of Austria and the Kings of Prussia, Denmark and the Low Countries, (the old kingdom of the Netherlands;) the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia, for all their possessions which anciently belonged to the German Empire, the King of Denmark for the Duchy of Holstein, and the King of the Netherlands for the Grand Duchy of Luxemburgh. The object of the Confederation is described to be the maintaining of the external and internal safety of Germany and the inviolability of the confederated States.

The Federal Diet, which administers the affairs of the confederacy, is composed of thirty-nine members, representing that number of German sovereign States. They are Austria, Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, Hanover, Wurtemburg, Baden, Electoral Hesse, the Grand Duchy of Hesse, Holstein, Luxemburg, Brunswick, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Nassau, Saxe Weimar, Saxe Cobourg, Saxe Gotha, Saxe Meiningen, Hilberghausen, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburgh, Anhalt-Dessau, Anhalt-Beruberg, Anhalt-Carthau, Schwartzburg-Sonderhausen, Schwartzburg-Rudolfstadt, Lichtenstein, Hohenzollern-Hechingen, Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, Waldeck, Reuss, (elder,) Reuss, (younger,) Hesse Homburg, and the free cities of Lubeck, Frankfort, Bremen and Hamburg.

Hesse Homburg has about two hundred square miles and 25,000 people, and five or six others are much smaller than any parish in Louisiana—but every one has a vote in a general assembly of the Diet—in opposition to what is called the ordinary assembly.

In the ordinary assembly the number of votes is seventeen. The larger States—as Austria, Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, down to Denmark, for Holstein—have one vote each, being eleven out of the seventeen. The other six are given to the smaller States in classes arranged together, each having one vote. The four free cities of Northern Germany have, collectively, one of these votes. The states are represented by their Ministers, severally, and Austria presides in the Diet. This is called the ordinary assembly, in which every question in first submitted and discussed before it goes to the General Assembly, and a majority of votes decides what measures shall be submitted to the General Assembly. The General Assembly is the same Diet, voting in different proportions. In the General Assembly the number of votes cast by the same members is sixty-nine. Six of the great States count four each. Five of the next degree of magnitude count three each. Three States have two each, and the remainder one each. The smallest has one vote in the General Assembly, and it takes a two-thirds vote to decide.

There is a class of questions which must be submitted originally to the General Assembly, and in this a unanimous vote is required for a decision. Among these are, all propositions concerning the fundamental laws of the Diet or the organic laws for carrying its objects into effect, or the admission of new members.

The States of the Confederation engage themselves to each other, not only to defend Germany as a whole, but every individual State of the Union in case of an attack, and mutually guarantee to each other all their possessions, as they were at the time of the Union.

When war is declared by the Confederation, no State can negotiate separately with the enemy, nor conclude peace or armistice without the consent of the rest.

Each member of the Confederation may contract alliances with foreign States, provided they are not directed against the security of the Confederation, or of the individual States of which it is composed.

The States engage not to make war upon each other under any pretext, and never to press their differences to the point of force, but to submit them to the Diet.

In case of rebellion or insurrection, in the several States, the Diet may interfere to suppress such insurrection or rebellion, as threatening the general safety of the Confederation, and may interfere, in like manner, on the application of any one State, the Diet has the supreme power of peace and war, as far as more German interests are concerned.

But there are States, and Austria is one of them, having possessions not German.

Whenever any one of these sovereigns undertakes a war, in his character of a European sovereign, the Confederation, whose relations and obligations are unaffected by such war, remains a stranger thereto; it remains neutral even if the war be defensive on the part of the Confederated sovereign as to his possessions without the Confederation, unless the Diet recognizes the existence of a danger threatening the federal territory.

Austria is at war, in regard to her possessions, without the Confederation, and so long as the war is confined there, or until the Diet recognizes in the events of the war a danger threatening Germany, the obligation to be neutral is in full force. But should the invading armies reach the German possessions of Austria, or an attack be made on any portion of Germany, on the city of Trieste for example, which is an ancient German possession, there is a German party which maintains it to be the duty of the Confederation to redeem the guarantee of the inviolability of federal territory, even against the results of a war, which, in its inception, was not German.

HAPSBURG AND SAVOY.

The House of Hapsburg and the House of Savoy, the ruling dynasties of Austria and Sardinia respectively, have alike been distinguished for centuries by prudent courage, discreet ambition and successful patience.

The growth of Sardinia has been slow. About eight hundred years ago, Count Humbert laid the foundations of the present monarchy in the little Alpine district of Savoy, which now occupies the North-western corner of the Sardinian territory. His descendents continued to grow stronger by degrees, with the title of Counts of Savoy, for nearly four hundred years, until the Emperor Sigismund, in the early part of the fifteenth century, bestowed upon Count Amadeus the Eighth, the title of Duke. The Duchy of Savoy continued to gather territory and influence. At the death of Amadeus, in 1440, it had become a power in the affairs of Europe. At the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, Victor Amadeus obtained the acquisition of Sicily, with the title of King. Sicily was afterwards exchanged for Sardinia, from which the kingdom now takes its name.

The growth of the House of Hapsburg has been more remarkable. The name of Austria (Oest reich, or the East Kingdom) carries us back to the time of Charlemagne. First a "margraviate," governed by "Lords of the marches" appointed by the German Emperors, then an hereditary duchy, then an arch-duchy, and lastly an empire, its progress has been onward for more than a thousand years.

One of the earliest occasions on which Austria figures in history is that of the third Crusade, in which Duke Leopold was one of the chief performers. It was he who took one of the enemy's towers at the seige of Acre and planted his own banner upon it. Richard Cœur de Leon, as chief commander of the Christian forces, was moved to indignation at this assumption and threw the flag into the ditch. Afterwards, when the walls of Ascalon were repaired by the crusaders, princes, nobles and bishops working like common laborers, the Duke of Austria alone refused to labor, declaring that he was neither a mason nor a carpenter.

Richard was now incensed beyond all forbearance, and drove Leopold from the camp.

The haughty Duke withdrew, vowing vengence, and his threats were afterwards fulfilled, when Richard fell into his hands—incidents well known in history.

All this, however, was before the rise of the present royal house of Austria. This Leopold was of the Babenberg family, which became extinct about half a century afterwards. The reigning Emperor, Francis Joseph, traces his origin to Rudolph, or Rodolph, Count of Hapsburg, a little village in Switzerland—who sprang from obscurity about six hundred years ago, and elevated himself by his talents to the imperial throne of Germany. By the defeat of his rival, Ottocar, of Bohemia, in 1578, he secured possession of the duchy of Austria, which has remained ever since in the hereditary possession of his family. Vast additions have been made to it from time to time, until it has attained its present commanding position. The House of Hapsburg has far outgrown that of Savoy, although the latter had about two hundred years the start of it.

The ambition of the court of Turin has evidently become eager and more impatient of late years. The rich plains of Lombardy are in tempting proximity, while just beyond lie the shores of Venetia—all far more closely allied to Sardinia, by language, literature and tradition, than to Austria. Most people believe that such considerations rather than love of "liberal institutions," induced the late king, Charles Albert, to take a stand in favor of constitutional government in 1848. His son and successor, Victor Emmanuel, inherits his policy and has pushed it forward with considerable vigor. The part which Sardinia took against Russia in the Crimean war would have been an act of consummate folly, unless it were done with a view to securing the alliance of France in the contingency that has now occurred. The marriage of the princes Clotilde to a Buonoparte was a step toward the consummation of the same object, and has been followed up by ultimate measures with more rapidity than could well have been foreseen a few months ago.

KOSSUTH ON THE HAPSBURGS.

In the speech on European affairs lately delivered by Kossuth, at London, he said, "In fact, Austria is the only power in Europe which has no national character; it is of no country, of no race; it is just a dynasty, and nothing more; it is simply the house of Hapsburg—no, not even that; everything in that accursed house is usurpation, down to their very name; they are not Hapsburgs, they are Lorraine-Vaudemonts, rebellious crown officers of France, as Napoleon I. used to style them—not they, but the Lords Denbigh, of the house of Fielding, are the only Hapsburgs on earth."

So long ago as the reign of Henry III. of England, he had, among his most favored followers, a German Knight—a younger son of the Count of Hapsburg and Rheinfeilder. The King gave him estates, and he assumed the name of Fielding, from one of the German titles of the house. The family grew in wealth through several generations. One of the descendants served in the civil wars of Charles I. and was created Earl of Denbigh in England, and his son was created Earl of Desmond in Ireland. The Fieldings adhered to their traditionary right to German honors for two hundred years—have added to their English and Irish titles that of Counts of "Hapsburg-Laufenburgh and Rheinfeilder," in Germany. The elder line of the Hapsburgs was extinct with Charles VI. Emperor of Germany. The Austrian family was continued by the daughter of Charles, the celebrated Maria Theresa, as Queen of Austria and Hungary, and by her marriage with Francis of Lorraine, Grand Duke of Tuscany, she became Empress of Germany—Francis having been afterwards elected Emperor. Thus—as stated by Kossuth—the Imperial house are not the true Hapsburgs, for they are represented in the male line by the Fieldings, of the house of Denbigh, in England.

A few words, explain what was meant by Napoleon I. in speaking of the Imperial family of Austria as "Lorraine-Vaudemonts," rebels to France.

The Emperor Francis, by his marriage with Maria Theresa, the head of the house, was at the time of his marriage Grand Duke of Tuscany, but was also Duke of Upper Lorraine, and native of that Duchy, which is now a department of France. But it was originally German, and only fell to France by a treaty made after the conclusion of a war for the succession in Poland, by which Lorraine was given to the ex-King of Poland, and Tuscany to the Duke of Lorraine. The King of France, (Louis XV.) who had married the daughter of King Stanislaus, on his death succeeded in Tuscany the last of the Medici; became, as we have stated, Emperor of Germany.

The famous novelist, Henry Fielding, author of "Tom Jones," figures very high up in the family tree of the Hapsburgs in England. He was the grandson of the second Earl of Desmond and third Earl of Denbigh, and therefore cousin, in some distant degree, but of the elder branch, to princes, kings and emperors.

CONDITION OF TUSCANY.

The Florence correspondent of the Providence Journal in his letter of May 14, writes: The direction of affairs in Tuscany has, within a few days, slid quietly from the hands of the three highly respectable citizens who formed the Provisional Government into those of the Cavalier Bon-Compagni, who has been for several years the Sardinian minister in Tuscany. The offer by the Tuscans to the King of Piedmont, of the dictatorship of affairs, during the war, was declined by Victor Emanuel, but the King has nominated his minister to be the medium of communication between the two States, and to carry out the wishes of the people of Tuscany. Bon-Compagni is well known here, and as the temporary head of the State and the link which will bind it to Piedmont and the cause of national independence will have the entire confidence of the country. The conduct of the Florentines continues to be most admirable, and the rest of Tuscany follows the example of the city. For our own part, we have not been prepared to expect anything different from what we now witness, after what we have learned, during our four years' residence, of the character of the Tuscans.

There is not among the masses of this country that brutality and degradation so common in England or Ireland, or the southern parts of Italy. Neither is there here so much ignorance and poverty as among the same classes in the first named countries. The population has much improved in many respects during the present century, with the advantages which it has enjoyed of more liberal laws. The Tuscans say they have learned much in the past ten years from the teachings and example of Sardinia. They are entirely prepared for just such institutions, and their sympathy with and approbation of the course of Sardinia led them to embrace so promptly and warmly her cause, when the miserable Leopold was obliging enough to leave them to take care of themselves. The fine climate—neither too stimulating nor too exhausting—helps to make this a people of lively quick intelligence. They are soothed or amused by gentler agents than our more rugged northern natures demand, and they have no craving for our coarse stimulants of strong drinks. So far as we can see, there are still in Italy the elements of all sorts of improvement. Glorious little Sardinia has introduced the lever which is to lift the iron shroud of priestly domination, and has established the doctrine that material developement and religious progress may not only go together, but by union may become the truest strength of the State.

RESOURCES AND ADVANTAGES OF OREGON

Oregon is possessed of millians of acres of as rich and fertile soil as lies within the bound of any State or Territory. Her grazing lands are unsurpassed. The broad and spreading valleys of the Willamette, Walla Walla and Umatilla, in Upper Oregon; the ample luxuriant farm lands of the Umpqua, Rogue River and Illinois Valleys in Southern Oregon, all invite the sturdy settlers, farmers and stock raisers of the older States, to come with their families, their goods, and herds, to occupy them. Noble rivers flowing from the far interior onward to the mighty Pacific, with ever-running tributaries, gratefully lave the banks through which they pass, and give never-failing moisture to the earth, at once assuring the husbandman against failure of his crops from drought, and enabling him to transport the yields to ready markets with safety and dispatch. With the Columbia navigable for nearly three hundred miles, the Willamette almost to its source, by steamers; with constant communication all along the coast by ocean steamships, Oregon presents an enviable field for the enterprise of every class of citizens engaged in traffic, inland or outward. She possesses almost inexhaustible resources in her mineral wealth, her rich land, her dense pine forests, and in her abundant yield of almost every variety of fruits peculiar to the temperate zone.

THE PRINTER OF JUNIUS.

The Pendleton (S. C.) Messenger, in a sketch of the "Old Stone Meeting House" in that town, after speaking of several celebrities buried in the yard, says: Beneath a cluster of cedars repose all that is mortal of John Miller, printer. We lingered long by his grave, for his eventful life afforded us food for meditation. Mr. Miller was the oldest type in the State. For the publication of Junius's letters—the author of those papers he well knew—he was expelled from England. He came to South Carolina; probably worked for a while in the office of the first paper published in this State, at Charleston, and thence removed to Pendleton, using the press which Gen. Greene had in his campaign; he did job work until he commenced the publication of the Pendleton Messenger—the second paper established in this State.

The world has speculated much as to the authorship of Junius, but John Miller carried the secret to his grave at the "Old Stone Meeting House," and has left no information as to the name of the author.

A GREAT BATTLE IN ITALY.

Read the telegraphic despatches on the third page. We unto the inhabitants of the world, for the Devil is come down to you, in great wrath.

ONLY A "DEFLECTION."

Rev. J. P. Tustin, late the courteous, charitable, and popular editor of the Southern Baptist, newspaper of Charleston, S. C., resigned his position, and set out on a tour to Europe. The journals of our Baptist brethren as well as others, were full of complimentary regrets at his loss from a position he occupied so satisfactorily. Lately, however, news has been received that he has applied for orders in the Episcopal Church. Whereupon a severe and ungenerous article appears in the South-western Baptist, charging Mr. Tustin with want of all sincerity in his religious convictions, with mercenary motives, and the like. It did not have a similar opinion Dr. J. J. South of Kentucky, and others, who joined the Baptist Church to avoid being expelled from the Methodist Church for cause.

The article in the South-western Baptist is appropriately headed, "Deflection of Rev. J. P. Tustin." We like that way of putting the case. Mr. Tustin belonged to a Church whose characteristic dogma made it the only Church of Christ on earth. He has not forsaken that dogma; he has only joined a Church which is older, where the dogma is older, and where a Great controversy may not disturb him. He has not forsaken the ecclesiastical aristocracy. He simply prefers a elite to a mobocratic aristocracy. It is only a "deflection." Graves' case was a real "defection," and he is still nursed; some generosity should be shown, therefore, to a simple "deflection."

OUR VICKSBURG DEPOSITORY.

The business of this Depository is on the increase. The preachers are waking up in certain portions of the Conference. Yet there are several others who might do a good business if they would wheel into ranks and march to the tune of "doing good, by distributing good books and tracts."

I fear sometimes, that some of our brethren will be impatient about Hymn-books and Family Bibles. We have lost the sale of at least a thousand dollars worth of Hymn-books, because the house at Nashville could not keep us supplied—could not fill our orders. We have not been able to keep on hand a full supply of these this year, although ordering almost every week. Good indication.

The Publishing House at Nashville has not been able to meet the demands for Hymns and Disciplines this year. This ought to encourage those of means to come up to the help of the House by endowing it. Many means are needed at Nashville.

All orders for Sunday-school books ought to be accompanied with the cash, as there is nothing allowed us for selling them. And to those who are tardy in paying for their books, I would say, that six months is the longest credit we can get. Notes or acceptances have to be given, which have to be paid at the time, or—we are protested.

Please remember this, and make us a remittance.

OUR MOBILE BOOK DEPOSITORY.

The Mobile correspondent of the Sumter Democrat furnishes the following in his last letter to that paper;

Apropos of home industry, I am reminded of a large branch of the same subject—the Methodist Book Depository of the Alabama Conference which has recently been opened in this city for the readier promulgation of the works of the Southern Publishing House at Nashville. The books are all handsomely gotten up and many are cheaper than they can be procured from Northern publishing houses. It is temporarily in charge of Rev. Mr. McCoy, but I learn that a son of the venerable Bishop Early is to assume a permanent superintendence of it about the first of July. Here we have at our very doors all the standard works of Methodism which formerly could only be disseminated through the colporteur's saddle-bags, or procured with great risk and delay from the North; whereas now, in every Southern State, periodicals are starting into existance, and the South is beginning to prove her declaration of independence in point of general as well as religious literature, as she must ere long do in many other respects.

DISCOVERIES RELATIVE TO THE BIBLE.

According to the London Athenæum, Professor Tischendorf, who had been sent by the Russian Government on a journey of exploration, in a letter from Cairo, dated the 15th of March, states to the Minister of Saxony, that he has succeeded in making some valuable discoveries relative to the Bible. The most important of these is a manuscript of the Holy Scriptures, of the fourth century, consequently as old as the famous manuscript of the Vatican. In 346 beautifully fine parchment leaves, of such size that only two can have been cut out of one skin, it contains the greatest part of the Prophets, the Psalms, the Book of Job, the Book of Jesus Sirach, the Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and several of the Apochryphal Books of the Old Testament; but then the whole of the New Testament is complete. Another valuable discovery of Professor Tischendorf's is described as an undoubted and complete manuscript of the Epistle of Barnabus, and of the Shepherd of Hermas. Herr Tischendorf hopes, from the munificence of the Russian Government, that he will be enabled to give immediate publication to these three manuscripts.

OLD SCHOOL GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The most exciting topic of debate in the Old School Assembly was the location of the North Western Theological Seminary. The rival points that struggled for the Institution were Indianapolis and Chicago. Mr. C. H. McCormick, the celebrated reaper man, offered to give his written obligation for $100,000, payable in four years, for the endowment of four professorships, if the Institution should be located in or near Chicago. There was also an offer of land at the same place, on which to place the building, valued at some $30,000. This was far more than Indianapolis offered, and on taking the vote, 250 were cast in favor of Chicago, and 71 for Indianapolis. The Assembly elected Dr. Rice, of Chicago, to the first chair of the Seminary, Didactic and Polemic Theology; Dr. Willis Lord, of Brooklyn, to the second, Biblical and Ecclesiastical History; Dr. L. J. Halsey, of Louisville, to the third, Historical and Pastoral Theology and Church Government; and Dr. Wm. M. Scott of Cincinnati, to the fourth, Biblical Literature and Exegesis.

The Assembly also elected Dr. Wm. L. Breckenridge to the Chair of Church Government and Pastoral Theology in the Danville Seminary.

The Mississippi Baptist, we are glad to find, is an courteous and charitable a religious newspaper as any in the land, notwithstanding the high-church dogma of the Baptist Church. A cheerful charity in the tone of the religious press is much needed. And the Baptist, as a Southern paper, is "as sound as a dollar." Not so with all the religious papers of the South. There is a secret unsoundness in that direction, in some quarters little suspected.

Hon. Joseph W. Taylor, of Alabama, we are informed, is the writer of "Phemonitus—A Tale of the South," published in the Advocate not long since. It appeared originally in the Home Journal. We found it elsewhere—hence the failure in credit. Mr. Taylor is a fine writer, as well as an eloquent orator.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

REACHING TO THE NEGROS IN "THE CANE-BRAKE."

This (Dayton) mission, was divided at the last Conference, by the greater number of its appointments transferred to other charges. The remaining ones, with several which I have added, make eight; and as I am allowed to preach on the Sabbath only, I have as much labor to perform as can be well done during the allotted time. I preach and catechise upon two different plantations each Sabbath, and then ride several miles between appointments. There are but two churches on the mission—at the other plantations, I preach in small open cabins. My congregations for the most part are small, consisting of negroes, and many of these neglect to attend.

There are in the Mission about four hundred grown persons, about sixty of whom are members of the church—and some of them, I think, pious. I have admitted twenty-two into the church this year. I catechise about one hundred children, some of whom I think are being benefitted. At other places where are as yet no indications of good.

I find it quite difficult to change the opinions and correct the habits of negroes in middle life; and my chief hope is that, by teaching the children and training them to think, we may grow up a truly religious and consistent race, free from the errors and superstitions of those who have been so long neglected.

The missionary work among the blacks, whether considered in its immediate or remote results, is a great and glorious work—worthy of personal effort, and the especial attention of Methodists. It is a work to be accomplished by the people of the South; and, aside from our convictions of religious duty, philanthropy and self-interest impel us, as a people, to have our slaves instructed in the doctrines of Christianity. As Methodist slaveholders, we are willing to engage heartily in the work; and if the owners of slaves will open the way and provide the means, we will be able to preach the gospel of truth and grace to every negro in the country. Their co-operation is necessary: without it we can do nothing.

I have, since my appointment as missionary among the blacks, fully and thoroughly examined the whole question, and while looking, have often trembled, in view of the moral condition of our negroes. They are ignorant, corrupt, vicious and superstitious, and yet they have not the "gospel preached unto them!" If our children were in the same condition, would not our hearts break with grief? And are not we, and they who are slaves, under the same obligation to have them taught in the things that pertain to their eternal welfare, as we acknowledge ourselves to be in reference to our children? Are they not both our dependents, and will not God hold us responsible for our influence over them and our treatment to them?

He has so declared—let us heed His word. How many Christian men make large donations to raise the means and employ men to send the gospel to heathen nations, who have crowds of negroes quartered on prairie hills and swamp bottoms, who are no word of God dispensed to them, even upon the Sabbath day!

I fear that my communication will be too long, yet I must say a few words more. The Dayton mission forms a portion of that section of country familiarly known as the "Canebrake."

The mission is about sixty miles square, is level, rich, beautiful and healthy. It is nearly all in cultivation, forming one almost continuous plantation. The "Canebrake" entire, contains upwards of one hundred thousand slaves, and I think I may say, from intimate knowledge, that not more than ten thousand ever hear the gospel preached—a small China or Japan, in our very midst! Gladly do we say that many planters are being aroused to a sense of their responsibility, and are employing the missionaries to preach to their slaves upon their farms. This is praiseworthy, and we welcome the fact as the harbinger of greater good in the future. But notwithstanding the great good effected by this system of operation, the plan has many defects. The greatest objection to it is that we cannot reach one-third of the slaves. It will take all the preachers in the Alabama Conference to preach to the negroes within its limits, if we pursue our present system.

We propose a better plan for the consideration of our Conference and for the approval of planters; because it is the province of the latter to decide upon its merits and to act accordingly. It is this: the erection of a suitable chapel, by two, three or more (as necessity requires) planters, at some convenient point for all.

In this way the missionary could preach to three or four times as many negroes as he now can, and do so with the same advantages to himself, the planters and the negroes. We can then preach to the same number of persons in one day, who now require the labor and service of four days.

Each church could be protected by the prudential arrangements thought necessary. And no harm could result from the plan. The economy of the plan is apparent. Four persons would then pay what is now paid by one, and in this way the house of worship would soon be paid for.

I have proposed and discussed this system among the slaveowners of the Dayton mission; and I report that, although some objected at first, they now acknowledge its advantages. They have long seen and felt the corrupting effects of permitting their slaves to attend Church in our towns, where they can buy liquor, etc. None of these things will be tolerated in the county. The planter or his overseer can be present, and order will be observed.

I hope to see not only the inauguration of this plan, but its success and glorious results. The gospel is that firm basis upon which the slave owner, the Christian slave owner, justifies the superiority of his position, and upon which he exacts service from his servants. Paul preached, and we preach, that "servants who are under the yoke" shall "count their own master worthy of all honor," and "not despise them." Also, said he, and so say we, "Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh: not with eye-service as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God." But, with the same emphasis, says he, and say we, too, "Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that ye also have a Master in Heaven."

What "is just and equal?" Fool and raiment only? Nothing less than that "bread of life" without which they will perish forever! God help us to investigate, to appreciate and to discharge our responsibility to our children and our servants!

We bring this plan before our Conference and patrons. Let the Bishops and Presiding Elders and all the preachers think upon and discuss this subject. Let us endeavor to save our negroes from those sins and vices, and that everlasting hell which shall devour them, unless they hear and obey the word of God.

THOS. S. ASBURY, Sr.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Coosa Mission.—Rev. E. Patton writes: "Coosa Mission lies on the Coosa river, extending from Wolf Creek to Gadsden or near it. It has thirteen regular appointments—six on the West, and seven on the East side of the river.

"We perform two rounds in six weeks, keeping our Sabbath appointments monthly, in order to avoid conflict with others. We have only two local preachers, elderly men, recently licensed—J. M. Keith and W. Finch—in all our bounds. We have, however, including those who have the pastoral care of Churches, eleven Baptist preachers, and one of these an appointed Missionary, occupying nearly the same ground. This brother is a Missionary Baptist; there are seven others of the same sort; two of the eleven are called "Two-seeders," and one Hardshell. Each one of these classes contend strenuously for "their faith"—I will not say, "once delivered to the saints"—but that they alone compose the only true Church of Christ.

"The Missionary preachers though they have difficulties enough among themselves, all agree with one consent to proclaim this sentiment—whether they fall under the Graves wing or the Henderson side. We sometimes read the general rules of our Discipline, and prove, we think clearly, that every sentiment, every doctrine and practice therein taught, is founded on the word of God. This is an interesting study to my mind. The people hear me patiently, and all treat me kindly. Good Baptist brothers and sisters invite me home, not with a cold, oblique, one-sided invite, but full-faced and warm-hearted. It makes me sorry, not that we have one another, but that our ecclesiastical circumstances separate us.

"Our own father had settled us around him—of his own bounty—own brothers and sisters, all made comfortable—and then prepared a great feast—invited us all, with our little ones; we had assurance that his design was to enlarge our inheritance; we had all come up decently dressed, in good health; the table was spread, laden with luxuries—servants in attendance. The old white headed father, with the tenderest of mothers—hear the announcement, "dinner is ready;" all march up, elbow to elbow. Just as they are ready to be seated, sister Jane draws back, and with manifest dissatisfaction in her countenance, says: "Father I cant partake." The father is startled. "Why, my child, what is wrong? Is this not your father's house?" "Yes, father, it is your house, and all is right with you; but sister Sally is here, and she dont wash her hands like I do." I go to the creek, put my hands under the water, and wash them; but she just has water poured out of a pitcher, and washes here!" "Why, my daughter, is she not your sister? Are her hands not clean? is she not a decent lady?" "All this I admit, father; but I cannot eat with her until she washes as I do; and then, father, I see sister Polly, there at the table, with her baby in her arms, she ought not to have brought it in; she ought to have left it out of doors." "My dear daughter, your blessed little babes are as welcome in my house as any of you. There is room enough for the last one of them; let them all come; they are mine by right any how; the dinner is mine, I give it, to you and your children." It does me good. Put a little of that sweet sauce in the baby's mouth." But she would still say, "I can't eat with sister Polly." Then brother Thomas comes up, and says: "Father, I am your son, am I not?" "Yes, you are all my children; and these are all your brothers and sisters. I love you all." "I know you are our father, and these are my brothers and sisters, but, somehow, not exactly. 'Tis true, they all work and make a living; they dress well and are educated, and are very good people; but we don't understand your directions precisely alike, about farms, how to set our houses, build our fences, lay off our corn-rows, feed our hogs, and so on. I admit we have all got the principle; but our minds, honest as they are, differ about the forms. I think that I know better than any of them, and therefore claim to be your son in a peculiar sense; and I want you to will to me all your estates." "Thomas, Thomas, Thomas! Do you design to reproach your mother? It grieves me."

"All this makes me sorry. We have had much rain and high tides in Coosa river, and we have had much deep fording and difficulty in getting along to our appointments. Now I am sorry that these good people have so much difficulty and are so trammeled with high water. But the Coosa waters are falling now, and, as it is customary on Coosa when it gets so Dicietly dry, to burn off the ranks, and as I am now reading the "Tongue of Fire," I do hope that we shall see better days.

Wetumpka.—Rev. B. M. Saxon, writes: "God has been pouring out his Spirit upon us, in a most remarkable manner for six weeks past. The cloud at first was small, but grew larger until it overspread the whole community, and watered and caused to bloom the waste places of Zion. All the Churches entered zealously into the work of the Lord, and shared largely of the great blessing. It would have done your heart good to have seen members of the different denominations sitting together around God's altar, singing, praying and telling to each other what great things God had done for their souls. Some of the oldest citizens of the place said, "we have never seen anything like this before." As brethren, as members of the household of God, we sat together in "heavenly places, in Christ Jesus," and rejoiced with that joy which is inexpressible and full of glory.

"It, it was a precious, joyful, glorious season! In some respects it was the most wonderful revival we have ever known. There were between forty and fifty conversions among the whites, and a number among the colored people. Twenty-seven white and fifteen colored have joined the Methodist Church, and others probably will join soon. Union prayer-meetings are still held every day, commencing at half-past seven o'clock and continuing one hour."

German Creek Colored Mission.—Rev. A. B. Ramsey sends his second report: "A blessed influence has pervaded our work during the past quarter. Thirty-one have sought and found peace. Fifty-six have united with the Church, on probation. Forty-five adults have been baptized. Others are inquiring the way of salvation. Old "hangers-on" have been aroused, and manifest a lively interest in our meetings. Your Missionary goes to his work with renewed confidence; trusting in God that his labors have not been in vain. One of my members deserves a passing notice—old brother Frank, at Bro. G. E. Nelson's mill-place—he says he is 107 years old, was at the surrender of Cornwallis: and talks enthusiastically of the revolution and of Washington and his compeers. He enjoys fine health and possesses all his faculties in an astonishing degree. But better than this—he is a pious man, prays in public, exhorts the Church to faithfulness, and enforces it by his own example."

Glenville Mission.—Rev. T. H. Warnlaw writes: "I send you my report for the first and second quarters, and a part of the third, of this year. This is my second year on this Mission. It has ten preaching places, four public places where the Missionary serves large collections of colored people from different plantations, who hear the word gladly. On the plantation appointments some of them seem to be doing well.

"But if we could get the patrons to unite and build Churches, we could do far better. We could then have more time to spend at each place—since all must be done on Sabbath.

"I have received forty-one on trial—in full connection, twenty—baptized nineteen—four dead. Some of the classes of children can answer correctly the questions in our catechism, repeat the commandments, etc, and seem to be delighted with the work. The Mission has had the attention of the Presiding Elder, who visited the work, preached some soul stirring sermons; held love-feast, administered the Lord's supper.

"The patrons treat the Missionary kindly, giving him a hearty welcome to their homes, and with the same courtesy they show to other ministers of the gospel."

Shelby Coal Mining Mission. Rev. J. T. Tulley writes: "This Mission is small, we have only two regular preaching places. We have, however, the best quarter, been preaching at three. One place does not promise much—the congregation is small, and in the main, the people unmoved. The other two appointments, our congregations is much larger than last year, and still on the increase. There are visible signs of good, of late. At the Lime-station, God has poured out his Spirit upon the people; sinners have been cut to the heart, and believers made to rejoice. At our last appointment I received ten members on probation—eight whites, two colored, making eleven members the first and second quarters, three colored and eight whites. Your Missionary asks an interest in the prayers of the Church.

Talladega District.—Rev. W. D. Mathews, P. E., writes: "Our prospects are cheering in some places in this District; and, I think, hopeful generally. At my two last meetings, Hillabee circuit and Arbacoochee Mission, we had very good meetings, and added some twenty members to the Church. The preachers are at their posts and doing well.

Clayton.—Rev. L. P. Gholson writes: "We have had a meeting going on here, some ten or twelve days. Some little interest—hope it will ripen into a gracious revival. We need it much."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Pattersonville.—Rev. John A. Miller writes: "We have just closed an interesting revival in this place, resulting in the conversion of six souls—four of them having joined the Church this year previous to the meeting, the other two joined during the meeting. We have received this year ten additions to the Church. Rev. A. B. Fly, our Presiding Elder, was with us, and preached, to the profit of Methodism in this section. He is a profound reasoner, and yet his sermons are powerful in spirit. We also had the assistance of Rev. B. F. Alexander. His preaching was blessed to the good of this people. He is working for his college while he is trying to save souls—the people helped him somewhat. My work is doing well. On the 8th and 9th inst., brother Fly held a quarterly meeting on Bayou Long, for the Grand Lake French Mission—Rev. Joseph Knight supplies the work. They had seven accessions, and a number of mourners were left at the altar. Prospects there were flattering."

Lake Blatchman Circuit.—Rev. R. Parvin writes: "The good Lord is reviving his work on our circuit; up to this instant we have received sixty into the Church, colored and white. We are holding a protracted meeting in a section of country where we have no regular Church. Last night there were thirty or more came to the altar, the most of them were young men, who bid fair for usefulness.

"We have but little help, only as we get sinners converted. This is the fifth day, and we have had the singing, praying, exhorting and preaching, almost to ourselves; but we shall hold on saying, "Oh! Lord revive thy work!" We have five Sabbath-schools, near two hundred scholars, and forty-five officers and teachers. These are all new schools, started this year—all but one."

Clinton.—We have received the following letter, and the money: "My strange but highly esteemed brother: The Lord having prospered our little farming operations the past season, and as one of the stewards of his manifold mercies, I desire to contribute a part of it to the promotion of his cause and kingdom in the earth. I beg of you to distribute the enclosed fifty dollars for me, to wit: $20 of it to our Chinese Mission, $10 to the German Mission, New Orleans, $10 to the Bible Society, $5 to colonize Liberia, and the remaining $5 where it is most needed; perhaps to some of our Indian Missions, and oblige your old, afflicted brother."

We shall do as directed.

Perry's Bridge.—Rev. T. B. White writes: "We have just closed a very interesting revival of religion at Perry's Bridge, resulting in several conversions—thirteen additions to the Church, and the membership greatly quickened.

"Also, at Queue de Tortue, we closed a precious revival meeting last week. Three professed religion, five joined the Church. Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good-will to men.

"We also raised a subscription to finish the Church at Perry's Bridge."

Anna Coca Circuit.—Rev. C. C. McCrary writes: "That he has the prospect of a general revival. At one meeting three or four were converted, and ten joined the Church. Up to this time, on the whole circuit, thirty-seven have joined on trial, thirty received into full connection, twenty-eight baptized—several conversions—three Sabbath-schools, all prosperous.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Sea-Shore Circuit.—Rev. J. W. McNeil writes: "We have just closed our second quarterly meeting at Biloxi, which was protracted four days. The Lord was with us. There was great feeling among the people. Eighteen accessions to the Church, and a general revival among the membership. Up to this time there have been forty accessions to the Church on this work, and every thing now indicates a general revival throughout the whole circuit. I ask the prayers of the Church, that the Lord will help us and pour out His Spirit upon the people during the summer; whilst the fashionable world is flocking to these great watering places, and pleasure retreats."

Galesville Mission.—Rev. J. English writes: "The cause of religion in this place is looking up. Rev. B. J. Jones closed his second quarterly meeting last night. Seven whites and two colored were received on probation, and one by letter. The seven who were taken on probation last year, have been received into full connection. There is some hope for Hunnewk county yet.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

By the Anglo-Saxon.—With Dates to June 8th.

The Battle of Magenta—Napoleon Claims a Decisive Victory—Marshal Canrobert Mortally Wounded—Revolt in Milan—Milan Evacuated by the Austrians—Rumors of Peace Proposals—Details of the Battle of Milan—Austrian and French Armies Engaged from the 4th of June to the 7th—Napoleon's Dispatches to the Empress—Great Enthusiasm at Paris—Five French Marshals Wounded—Canrobert Mortally Injured—Austrian Accounts of the Engagement.

The Engagements.

London, June 8. The Parisian accounts from the Imperial headquarters of Napoleon, are dated the 7th of June.

According to the bulletin published in the Moniteur, both armies advanced on the left bank of the Po, and, when near the town of Magenta, a short distance South-east of Buffalora, a general engagement took place.

The French, under Napoleon, is estimated to have numbered from 100,000 to 130,000, while the forces of the Austrians under Gen. Hess are said to have been from 150,000 to 180,000.

The Bulletin at Paris addressed to the Empress claims a decided victory, saying that the French took 7000 prisoners, and that from 9000 to 12,000 Austrians were killed and disabled.

As soon as the news reached Paris, the population thronged the Boulevards, and at night the whole city was illuminated.

The engagement must have been a terrible one, as five French Marshals are reported among the wounded.

Gen. Espinasse, of the French army, is among the killed.

Marshal Canrobert, commanding the third corps of the French army, is mortally wounded.

Latest from Paris.

London, June 8. Gen. McMahon, commanding the second corps of the French army, has been created Marshal of France and Duke of Magenta, in consideration for his value and bravery on the battle field of Magenta.

It is reported that Milan is in revolt and evacuated by the Austrians, but not yet occupied by the French.

Further by the Anglo-saxon.

Great Battle in Italy.—The Killed and Wounded.

Magenta, June 5, 6 P. M.—The total number of Austrians taken prisoners in the several engagements at the crossing of the Ticino and the village of Magenta, is 7000 and upwards.

The total number of Austrians placed hors de combat is at least 20,000.

Three field pieces were captured from the enemy and two flags.

The French loss is about 3000 killed and wounded. One cannon was also taken by the enemy.

No advanced movement has been made to-day, the army either retiring or being engaged in reorganization.

A later dispatch from the headquarters of the Allied camp, says that the people of Milan had risen against the Austrians, and that the latter had evacuated the city and castle.

In the precipitation of their flight, the Austrians left all the cannon and treasure of their army behind them.

Another despatch from head-quarters says:

"We are encumbered with prisoners. We have taken 12,000 Austrians."

The Austrian accounts by way of Vienna do not differ materially from the French, but they claim that the result of the contest was undecided.

They acknowledge, however, the evacuation of Milan.

The London Times, of June the 8th says:

"This hard-fought battle is even yet undecided, but on the whole the French have the best of it."

The following is the full Austrian account of the battle, by way of Vienna:

"There was a fierce battle at Turbigo and Buffalora on the 4th.

"At first only two brigades of the first corps were engaged, but they were subsequently reinforced.

"On the afternoon of the same day the third Austrian corps took part in the action, which was severely contested."

The first news of the battle of Magenta was telegraphed to the Empress Eugenie by the Emperor Napoleon from Novara. In that dispatch the Emperor says:

"A great victory has been won at the bridge of Magenta. Fifteen thousand of the enemy were killed and wounded, and five thousand taken prisoners.

The rumors in Paris were that the loss of the French at Magenta was 10,000. The number of the force engaged was 150,000, and 180,000 Austrians; another report says that 100,000 French, and 130,000 Austrians. The latter admit four generals and five staff-officers wounded.

Gen. Hess commanded the Austrian army, and the Emperor Napoleon the French.

The latest rumors detract from the alleged French victory. It is believed that the French will enter Milan, and proposals for peace will be made.

Great Battle near Milan.

A battle has been fought near Milan. The Austrians were defeated—great slaughter on both sides. The Austrians lost 15,000 in killed and wounded, and 5000 prisoners. French loss, 12,000.

The Austrians have evacuated Milan.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, June 20, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price Current, ending on the 18th inst.:

With reduced stocks of most of our leading commodities, and a market left with comparatively few operators, the week has passed with but little activity of movement in any department. Later and still more favorable European advices, however, have tended to produce a still further advance in the prices for our leading staple, Cotton, and Tobacco has again received a fair degree of attention, while Sugar and Molasses, and nearly all articles of Western Produce, have moved slowly, and generally in limited quantities.

On Saturday we had European advices four days later, from Liverpool by the steamer North Briton, reporting an improved Cotton market at Liverpool, with sales for three days of 28,000 bales, an advance of 1-16 to ⅛d. was noticed, the quotation for Middling Orleans being 6¾d. The advices from the manufacturing districts were still more favorable and Consols had advanced 1 per cent, being quoted at 93¼ to 93⅜ for money. On Wednesday morning the Europa's advices, still three days later, were before the public, with the regular weekly report of the Liverpool Cotton market, by which it appeared that the sales of the week had reached the large amount of 67,500 bales, and the advance within the week was stated at ¼d. per pound, the quotations being 8d. for Fair Orleans and 6¾d. for Middling ditto. There was an advance at Havre, also, of 1 to 2 francs, with sales for the week of 6000 bales. This intelligence emboldened holders here to obtain a further ¼ cent advance, with sales of about 2000 bales, and on Thursday the sales reached some 6000 bales, at rates fully sustaining the advance above noticed. Friday, at an early hour there were rumors of later and still more favorable European advices, but they were not authenticated, and tended to obstruct the movement of the market, the sales being confined to about 3000 bales; making a total for the week of 14,000 bales. Total receipts of the week 2950, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,647,208 bales, against 1,531,896 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 20,794 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 17th inst. 71,453 bales. With respect to prices, we have to state that an advance of full ⅛c. has been realized on all qualities embraced in the demand, which is almost exclusively for the Low Middling, Middling and Good Middling descriptions. The stock untold is now reduced very low, and consists chiefly of the lower and the better grades, which are comparatively neglected.

Mansfield Sabbath School Celebration.

June 4th, 1859.

Mr. Editor: Yesterday, for the first time in the history of our flourishing little village, we had, what I imagined every one who witnessed it would unhesitatingly pronounce, a grand Sabbath-school celebration.

Arrangements for that purpose had previously been made, by a united effort on the part of the two schools—Union and Methodist. To most of our people it was rather a new thing; but we had heard and read of the like in other places, and could not see why Mansfield, where there are near two hundred Sabbath-school scholars, should not have a Celebration. So meetings for the purpose were held, plans adopted, committees appointed, and a general working commenced; everybody became interested, all were looking forward to the day, which was Friday, the 3d inst.—it at length arrived. An assembling at the Methodist Church of the children and their teachers and officers, with many other interested ones, commenced at 9 o'clock, A. M., and in due time a procession was formed, all under the management and direction of several of our very clever young men, who acted as marshals. The boys were placed in front, the girls next—but all attended by their teachers—the ministry, superintendents and others, brought up the rear in appropriate form. The command was given, the march commenced and conducted through the principal streets of our town to the Baptist Church, under the waving of beautiful banners borne by our honored young gentlemen.

The house soon became densely crowded, but all seemed to be arranged in imposing order. The programme was then read by the Chief Marshal, Mr. J. B. Adam, who upon the occasion acquitted himself with much credit. The ceremonies commenced with prayer, by President H. C. Thweatt, D.D.; and was followed by addresses from a number of the juveniles, so inspiring and appropriate as to elicit long and loud applause from the multitude which thronged the commodious house dedicated to God's worship. Much interest was added to the occasion by the charming sacred music, led by Prof. Donaldson, and assisted by some of the most accomplished, in this art, of our College pupils. The exercises in the church were closed with addresses by each of the Superintendents—Mr. H. N. Williams on the part of the Union, and John D. Scales, Esq., on the part of the Methodists.

And here, Mr. Editor, arises my objection to making this report. I am not competent to do justice to the merits of these addresses—both were chaste, elegant and appropriate—each treating upon kindred subjects, and presenting the claims of the Sabbath-school in such light as to awaken an interest in this heaven-favored institution, hitherto unfelt and unseen.

The ceremonies concluded in the house, all repaired, in order, to "a feast of fat things," literally; the dinner was prepared principally by our good housewives—God bless them! what would the world be without them?—and was done up in such style as none others could do the things.

It was really a novel sight, from the hours of nine A. M. till twelve at noon, to see the baskets pouring in from every direction, borne by neatly clad servants, and they, too, happy and rejoicing in the general jubilee. The contents of the baskets, combining all the delicacies that could be arranged by fair hands, was spread out, crowding a table one hundred and twenty feet in length, set under a thick bush-arbor erected in a rich grove of wide-spreading oaks. I must not omit to mention here, the fine barbecue of choice meats prepared, in addition to the other variety of good things, by some of our worthy citizens, who, we always find "foremost in every good word and work;" but all contributed in some way or other, liberally. The little ones were first conducted to the table, ate, and appreciated the attention; afterwards, the grown people, indiscriminately. Everybody seemed satisfied and happy; there was a superabundance for all—numbering, perhaps, one thousand.

The afterpart of the day was given up to the young people, who retired to a beautiful green and shady lawn; those of younger years, were gathered about in romping groups—free and unrestrained, happy and joyous in their thoughtless innocence; while here and there could be seen a more retired couple, and of more mature age, talking, perhaps, upon a subject intimately connected with their future happy destiny. Long may these reunions take place, to make glad the hearts of our children, and smooth the wrinkles of age.

But one thing tended to mar the pleasure of any upon this happy day, the absence of the much-loved pastor of the M. E. Church, Rev. S. B. Strait; he had gone to visit the parents of his deeply lamented wife, and to surrender to them her sweet little infant son, the precious relic of a most lovely woman: and was detained, on account of the illness of his father-in-law. A. M. C.

Death of the Ban Jellachich.

We learn from Vienna that the Ban Jellachich, who became famous in the revolution of 1848, has just died at Agram. The Ban had long been laboring under a disease of the chest, as well as sciatica, and had taken up his residence at Agram, where he has just died. Should the intelligence be confirmed, the Emperor of Austria loses one of his most faithful friends, and one, moreover, who has done the State some service in his time. No Ban of the Croats ever possessed such entire power over that wild, unruly tribe as Jellachich. He was possessed of the greatest firmness of character, allied to much humanity and a high sense of Justice, which made the Croats under his command look up to him as a father, and rely on his judgment with the blindest obedience, and abide by it, according to a saying common amongst them, "whether right or wrong." Jellachich, in spite of the life of warfare he had led, was devoted to the arts and sciences, and was the inventor of the art of fixing the color on zinc by means of acid, now so generally adopted, and which in France has increased the value of zinc, according to returns of the Vielle Montague, more than forty per cent. during the last few years. The Italian General Cialdini.

Cialdini, who is a General of Division in the Sardinian army, and of whose operations on the Senia the last news brought us an account, is a soldier of fortune, and has risen almost from the ranks. He is a native of Modena, and embarked in the last war in Spain, taking the side of the Liberals. He commenced as a lieutenant, and was there for seven years, and fought so bravely that he was promoted to the rank of Colonel, and received from the Queen the order of "Isabella the Catholic." In the struggle against Austria, in Italy, in 1848, he received the rank of Colonel from Charles Albert, who afterwards promoted him to the rank of General, and by Victor Emanuel he was presented with the commission of General of Division. He fought with great bravery in the Crimea, and played a brilliant part at the Tchernaya.

Newspapers in the Olden Time.

In 1718 the Boston News Letter, which had been printed on a half sheet, of foolscap size, was enlarged so as to require a whole sheet. The publisher naively remarked that it was impossible "with half a sheet in the week to carry on all the public News of Europe, though hitherto all those of Great Britian, Ireland, our own and our neighboring Provinces have been yearly inserted." He was now thirteen months behind hand with [illegible] news, and to make up the deficiency, and to [illegible] now that used formerly to be old," he resolved to print a whole sheet every other week. What would our readers think of waiting fourteen months, or fourteen days, or fourteen hours, even, for their foreign news?

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

ROMANCE OF THE LAST ISLAND CATASTROPHE.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, dated New Orleans, May 28, 1859, says: A story, strange and romantic enough to seem the invention of an imaginative mind, became known recently to a few persons in this city; yet however romantic and strange it may sound, the gentleman who communicated it to me assured me of its absolute truth, and gave me the names of the parties connected with the affair. At the time when that terrible catastrophe occurred at Last Island, off the Southern coast of Louisiana, by which so many unfortunate people were swept bodily into the Gulf by the raging tempest, or overtaken and drowned by the rising flood that overwhelmed the low, sandy key, a middle aged gentleman and his family, consisting of a wife and two or three children, were involved in the calamity.

In the midst of the thick gloom, the storm, the confusion and terror of the scene, the gentleman became separated from his little family and barely escaped with his life. The horror and distress of the poor man at the sudden loss of his dear ones may be imagined by those who love their own wives and children. For several days his friends feared that his mental sufferings would deprive him of reason, and one of them kindly invited him to make his home at his house in New Orleans, for a time, hoping that he would gradually come to look more calmly upon the misfortune that had befallen him.

It happened that with the family in which he thus became domesticated was living a young and accomplished lady, of fine person and manners, who, having compassion upon the afflicted stranger, took upon herself the pious duty of doing everything in her power to alleviate his sorrow and make him forget the past. She played and sang for him, read to him, talked with him, walked with him, rode with him, and finally laughed and joked with him—so fleeting and transitory are the greatest of human griefs when brought under the influence of the enjoyments and delights of life.

In brief, she carried her consolations so far that the gentleman became enamored, infatuated, and offered her his hand and fortune. Whether she reciprocated his passion or whether the fact that she won a poor school teacher and he a wealthy planter influenced her decision upon his proposition is not a question proper to be considered here. Suffice it to say that she accepted his offer, stipulating that out of due respect to public opinion a year must elapse before their union should be consummated. As time passed on the preparations for a magnificent wedding proceeded. The gentleman purchased a splendid trousseau, laid out his plans for a bridal tour and for their subsequent domestic settlement, and, in fact, everything went on swimmingly until near the close of his term of probation.

The event of a single day, in this case as in thousands of others, served to destroy in an instant his matrimonial schemes, though whether his subsequent peace of mind and happiness were not promoted thereby is a question. A short time previous to the day assigned for his wedding he received a letter from his wife—still in the flesh—dated at Rio de Janeiro, informing him that she and one of their children were alive and well, and would probably be in his arms within a very brief period. It appears that amidst the destruction and chaos of the terrible storm in which it had been supposed that she and her little ones were lost, Madam —— clung to her youngest child, and when the waves submerged the Island and swept away everything upon it, she floated out into the Gulf upon certain fragments of the wreck.

Drifting, finally, after much suffering, into the track of sea-going vessels to and from this port, she was picked up by an outward bound ship and carried to Rio, no opportunity occurring, in the meantime, to send her back to the States. The voyage was a long one, and sickness had prevented her from taking passage in the first vessel that sailed for her native land, and by some fatality the letter which thus apprized him of her existence reached his hands but a few hours previous to her own arrival. What followed can readily be imagined—how the sober, staid, middle-aged gentleman, doubtful whether to be disappointed, broke the astounding news to his unsuspecting fiance; how she, poor girl, went first into tears and then into hysteric, and was finally consoled by his pecuniary liberality, and how all parties ultimately resumed their original positions and were happy, the wife not being permitted to know how narrowly her husband had escaped slipping his neck into a second matrimonial halter.

HON. WM. B. REED, ON HIS MISSION TO CHINA.

The Hon. Wm. B. Reed last week, made a speech of great length to the merchants of Philadelphia, setting forth the objects and results of his mission to China in behalf of the United States Government. At the close Mr. Reed spoke as follows in regard to the "missionaries:"

"One other word, and I have done. It has reference to higher thoughts than any connected with political or diplomatic success. No one can pass even an short time as I have done, in the dark, cold shadow of Pagan civilization, such as is found in China, or among what we may hope to be the ruins of Hindu or Mahometan superstition, without new gratitude that his lot is cast in a Christian land, and without the conviction that there can be no true effective enlightenment without Christianity; and to speak more practically still, no one can see what I have, without recognizing the duty of acknowledging the enormous debt of gratitude to those devoted men and women who, as missionaries, are struggling for the conversion and education of the heathen, and our obligation to sustain them. I went to the East with no enthusiasm as to missionary enterprise. I came back with a fixed conviction that, in its true and harmonizing power, and in its increasing influence on commercial adventure, it is under Providence, the great agent of civilization; and I feel it my duty to add, that everywhere in Asia and Africa, among the Caffres in Natal, on the continent of India, among the forests of Ceylon, and over the vast expanse of China, the testimony to the zeal and success to our countrymen as missionaries of truth, is earnest and concurrent. I heard it everywhere, and from high authority. Their praises greeted me when, after the dreariness of a long voyage, I put my foot ashore at the Cape of Good Hope, and when, nearly two years afterwards, I made farewell to Eastern lands, my last delightful duty was to visit, and for myself see the largest missionary-school in Egypt, kept and admirably administered by an American—a Philadelphia woman (Miss Dale,) at Alexandria."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. CHARLOTTE C. CRARY, consort of Jos. A. Crary, and daughter of Francis and Asenath Sadler, died of consumption, in great peace, May 24th, near Fort Pike, La. She was born July 19th, 1831, and married June 3d, 1851. Although our Sister's sufferings were great, she was enabled by the grace of God to bear it all without a murmur. Her faith did not waver for a moment, and she was a blessed witness of the truth of God's promise, "My grace is sufficient for thee." She was a member of the Methodist Church, joined under the ministry of Bro. G. T. Vickers in 1849. Subsequently, while in the grove, praying alone, the Lord mercifully "spoke peace to her soul." She had a praying mother. She often talked of dying, gave directions about her children and burial, but never felt that she had dying grace, until three days before she died. The writer of this was sitting by her bedside, a copy of the Christian Advocate was lying on the bed—I cast my eye upon an obituary notice of the happy death of a Christian—I showed it to her, and then asked her if she felt that she was willing to go? She said, "O yes; nature says live, but the Lord's will be done. I have given up my children, I am perfectly resigned. She sang in a loud clear voice that sweet hymn, beginning:

"How happy every child of grace."

I found written in the fly leaf of her book of Psalms, that our Pastor gave her, these words in a trembling hand, "Praise God forever! I wish I was able to write all my mind, but I have prayed God to be with me to the end; and Glory, Glory! I feel that he will." She bid all her friends farewell, and gave them all her dying messages on Sunday; but she lingered until Tuesday morning, when her husband only stood by her, she said to him, "Dear, I am going; I want you to stay by me until I am gone; dont call the family, their moaning distresses me; I have no more to say. I dread the last struggle a little, but I have no doubt all is right." SUZETT.

ELLEN, only child of G. B. Hopkins, aged 13 years, died, Sunday, June 12th. Ellen was a sweet, gentle child, she loved the Bible and the Sabbath School; was always punctual in attending with lessons well learned; her unselfish, attentive behaviour won for her the affection of her teacher and classmates. One little one exclaimed on hearing of her illness, "She will be a great loss to the Sunday school, she was our best scholar. Last Sabbath, one short week ago, she met with her class in good health, with a happy smile on her face; little did we think that by another Sabbath she would cross the dark river, and gain a heavenly home. Dear Ellen, how we shall miss you when we meet together to learn of Christ and sing his praise; but we shall know you are singing in a brighter, happier land. Oh, sorrowing parents! although bereaved and childless now, learn to say, "Thy will be done," and thank God for the consolation, that she, who was so kind and loving here, is waiting for you at the gate of heaven. And may all who were accustomed to see Ellen's sweet face each Sabbath in the school, teacher and classmates, meet her in heaven.

HER SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER.

MR. SAMUEL RONNER, died of paralysis in Pickens County, Alabama, April 29th, 1859. He was born in Fairfield District, S. C., August 17th, 1784; was married to Miss E. C. McKinstry, March 12th, 1816; professed religion, and joined the Methodist Church in 1822. He was a pious and consistent member, punctual in attendance at the house of God, and liberal in his contributions for the support of the Gospel. His house was a home for the Preacher, to which many of the Itinerancy of the Ala. Conference will cheerfully attest; he was mild and sociable in his manners, winning general respect and friendship. As a husband, father and master, he was affectionate, paternal, and forbearing. He leaves a wife and four children, all members of the Church. We feel a confident assurance that our loss is his eternal gain. J. T. BONNER.

WALTER C. SWAYZE, aged fourteen years and three months, died October 24th, 1858.

ELLA GERTRUDE SWAYZE, aged nine years and eleven months, died April 17th, 1859.

ZACHARY TAYLOR SWAYZE, aged eight years, died May 8th, 1859.

The deceased are the children of Mrs. Margaret F. Swayze, Jackson, Louisiana. By an inscrutable Providence, in the space of about six months, death has three times entered the same family circle, and left the widowed and bereaved mother to mourn the loss of a beloved child. The plants are withered from about her table, the flowers crushed on her bosom, but they shall bloom forever with God. Our sister will have the prayers of God's people who read this—her hope is in Jesus.

T. W. BROWN.

MRS. ANNA C. wife of J. McCondlehin and daughter of Dr. Herbert, died near Snow Hill, Alabama, May 19th, 1859, in her 25th year. For months before her death, she evinced more than usual interest upon the subject of religion, and proposed to her husband to unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and her friends have reason to hope in her death. Her afflicted father and also her bereaved husband, had frequent conversations with her, and believe she died in peace. She leaves a kind husband and two sweet babes to mourn. T. NORRIS.

Allenton Alabama, June 7th, 1859.

SISTER NANCY SIMPSON died on Bayou Sorrel, on Tuesday, June 7th, 1859, aged about forty-three. More than two years ago she gave her heart to God, from that time till her death, she was found at her post. She was quiet and unpretending in her manner, a faithful wife, an affectionate mother, and a warm friend. In her last hours her mind was darkened, but her Christian course is sufficient evidence that she has entered into rest.

F. T. RAWSON, PASTOR.

ELIZABETH ANN, daughter of J. H. and E. J. Gullion, and wife of J. C. Hughes; was born in March 1840, professed religion, and joined the Church in 1855. She suffered great pain, though she endured it with the calmness and fortitude of a Christian wife and mother. Sister Hughes leaves an interesting little son, a kind, though unconverted husband, affectionate parents, sisters and brothers, with a large circle of relatives and friends.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from Z. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, speaking at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

Dear Vesey: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am indirect to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from 1we and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as carried.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the fiend three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length, and in running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

LETTER FROM TABLE ROCK, S. C.

My last letter left me seated by the old Table Rock Register; and in that letter I promised to furnish you with some of the curious things contained in this queer old book. I proceed now to redeem that promise.

Let no one think that in publishing these extracts, that private matters are being thrust before the public. In the Register every writer writes his name, and, before leaving, makes a record of his impressions, feelings and views, after looking upon the Rock and its surroundings. This old Register is as great a curiosity in one way as the Rock is in another. On every page there is something odd, droll or witty. It is equal to a play. you find a hundred things at which to laugh, some things to admire, and some to censure.

On its pages I found many names that have long since been written in the dust. I found many that are deeply written on my heart. Some who have lang since gone to rest in the quiet church-yard home. Some whose spirits rest upon the mount of God.

Among the many who have looked upon this rugged pile of granite with wonder and amazement, I find that a Master Jones has taken a view and left a record of his feelings. I do not know which branch of the Jones family he belonged to; I have no thoughts that he was any kin to any other family of the same name. He evidently had a turn for poetry—a talent which shines out in the following lines.

"Oh, mercy! such a pile of stones
Was never seen by John M. Jones.
But thou, oh mount of centuries!
Hath stood majestic and sublime!
And yet thy rocky self remains,
Unhurled by the touch of time.

Yet, when the judgment trump shall sound
And from the graves call forth the dead,
Thou like a stricken deer shall fall,
And in the dust bow low thy head."

As explanatory of the following, I may state that there is standing on the Rock, near the edge of the precipice, a cedar stump. To walk around this, is considered a very daring feat—many accomplish it—even some timid ladies. In the Register, there is this prose entry.

"This day my son, George W. Mc——, a mere boy, only ten ears, walked around the cedar stump. The guide says he is the smallest boy that ever made the attempt."

Immediately under this, a waggish writer wrote as follows:

"I should like ta see George, not because he walked around the stump, but because he has 'ten ears.' He must be a curiosity."

Of poetry, rhymes and doggerel, there is a supply equal to the most exorbitant demand.

I find the following written in a cramped, school-girl hand. No name accompanies it—and we are left without even a reasonable amount of guessing margin. She has grown older by many years since this was written, if still living, and, perhaps, may now be famous in the world of letters. Whatever may be said of her talent for poetry, she evidently had a heart in the right place; and in it some of the elements that are essential to making up a good heart. I doubt whether her "absent one" was

"All her fancy painted him;"

If she ever realized the wished for happiness of having her "own heart's delight" seated by her side. I hope she found him as "noble, pure and good," as she describes him in these touching lines. But we shall never know her name, her home, nor her destiny. Perhaps her "heart's young affections" all were blighted, and she may in a brighter world, be waiting still for the "absent one." This may meet the eye of some one now rich in literary fame, and bring back to mind a period that now lies buried amid the by-gones of twenty years; and she will, perhaps, remember,

"When her dream of life,
From morn 'till night,
Was love, still love."

And when amid the day-dreams of bliss, that gave such gladness to her young and trusting heart, she poured, in the old Table Rock Register, these measureless lines:

"TO THE ABSENT ONE."

"Would thou wert with me; my own heart's delight!
Would, thou wert seated by my side to-night.
Many long months have past since we parted—
Months, with their moments of sadness and light.
When thou wert here, in the hours of thy childhood,
When thou wert running life's pathway with me,
Freely as birds chanted their songs in the wild wood,
Gave I my heart's young affections to thee—
There was around thee a sweet fascination:
Youthful temptations thy soul hath withstood.
Thou, dearest one, art the personification
Of all that is noble, lovely and good."

Thus, I have given you some specimens of Mountain Poetry. Other pieces I have copied, are quite equal to the best productions of K. N. Pepper.

From many impromptu pieces of poetry I select the next following, as the very best in the book. This has many faults, but is not destitute of merit. Some thoughts are well expressed, and, though the phraseology is not well chosen, still, as an impromptu, it will "pass muster" with credit. It may have been published ere this, with the author's name—I know not. I find under it only this signature—"Seymore, N. C." I copy literally.

"While gazing on this mount of Rock,
Raising to heaven its noble form,
We feel, oh God, the mighty truth,
That man's a frail and helpless worm.

Though in thy glorious image made,
Endowed with mind of strength and power,
He disappears like morning clouds,
Which o'er the mountain's summit tower;
Three score and ten of fleeting years,
The boundary of his earthly lot;
But ah! before one-third is past—
Death comes—and lordly man is not."

Here and there, a page is silmed over with the sentiments of some restless infidel, whose soul has been made painfully sensible of its own littleness, by contrast with the stupendous works of God, around. On the other hand, there are enlightened Christian sentiments left on record, that carry with them evidence of well-furnished heads and well-regulated hearts.

We take leave of the rock this evening; and move north, for Cæsar's head. We shall never look upon its like again. There is perhaps in all the world nothing that so overwhelms the heart with reverence and awe, as the view of this mountain. You are filled with something akin to terror, as you gaze upon Niagara's roaring flood; and, turning away, you feel that God has preached you a sermon upon His own power and majesty and glory—a sermon to be remembered forever. You stand by the rock-bound shores of ocean, when the boomb of the storm-driven billow is echoed from every cave and crag. Here, too, the heart is bawed in reverence, before the God

"Who plants His footsteps on the sea
And rides upon the storm."

But as ither the earthquake tread of Niagara, nor the storm as it rides the ocean, so overawes and subdues the proud heart of men, as to stand beside this vast and stupendous pile of granite, lifting its awful form in silent, solemn grandeur, to kiss the blue arch of heaven above.

For the present farewell, H. T. LEWIS.

BAPTISM BY WALDENSES.

PASTOR REVEL TO REV. DR. BAIRD.

Our School of Theology gives us much satisfaction. Two of our first students are passing the winter, one at the Presbyterian College at Belfast in Ireland, under the paternal direction of Prof. Gibson, who has so recently visited your country, and the other at Edinburgh, at the College of the Free Church, under the patronage of Drs. Cunningham, Bonar and others. The news which we have of them is very favorable. Those who are now at La Tour gratify us by their conduct, their progress in knowledge, and their progress in the Christian life. The new era which opened upon our Church in the year 1848, found it degraded and stupified by ages of persecution and systematic oppression. It required, therefore, some time to get the machine in a proper condition to endure a rapid and regular movement without being deranged or broken. It was essential that it should be made able to move, that the motive power (the Holy Spirit) should be felt, and that the oil of that love of which Christ alone is the author, should every day soften and facilitate its movements.

As to the questions which you have addressed to me touching the mode of administering baptism, I hasten to answer them in the briefest and most precise manner possible. 1. The mode of baptizing in our Churches is pædo-baptism, by the sprinkling of pure water on the forehead by the minister, who pronounces solemnly the sacramental words, Matt. xxviii. 19, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. 2. This practice has never varied in our Church, and we have never had, nor do we now have, any opposing or Baptist party. 3. Although the Waldenses of Piedmont have always been pædo-baptists, we find enemies who accuse them not only of rejecting the baptism of children, but baptism in general! This accusation has apparently some foundation, inasmuch as in the middle ages it was brought against those who in the South of France were called Waldenses, but who were a portion of the Cathari. It is thus that the work of Raincrius, "contra Waldenses," sets forth and charges upon us the doctrines and practices of the Cathari. But you know that the Cathari, who for a long time existed in the South of France, derived their doctrines from the East, which they wrought up into a mixture of Gnostic, Manichean, and Paulician principles, with some of the truths of the Gospel, and that, according as there were more or less of the evangelical element, they professed a dualism absolute or relative. But all the Cathari were agreed in rejecting all that was traditional and external. They pretended to re-establish the primitive and apostolic simplicity, and this under a form corresponding to their own principles. They rejected pædo-baptism and for the most part, baptism in general. The first class maintained even that John the Baptist was an agent of Satan, and that his baptism was a means of enrolling disciples. They pretended that in the New Testament baptism stands for repentance. The true baptism for them was made by the imposition of hands and the prayer which they called consolamentum, and the latter was of a double nature. They had one for the credentes (who were just introduced into the sect,) and another for those who were called perfecti or consolati.

But pardon me: I perceive that I am giving you a lesson about the Cathari, which you know better than I. Permit me only to make a distinction respecting the origin of the Waldenses, which appears to me to be historically plausible and very important. The Waldenses had both a Gallican and an Italian or Piedmontese origin. There were thus two streams, which arose in two different regions, but which the same religious wants, the study of the same word of God, opposition to the same errors of Rome, and the same papal persecutions, directed one towards the other; then they became united in one common river, to be lost at a later period in the vast flood of the Reformation. When we examine closely all the movements of the Anti-Romanists and Reformers of the South of France in the Middle Ages, we find elements of doctrines, Oriental and Manichean, mixed up with Scriptural truths which constitute the basis of the life of these different sects; the Albigenses included; although the latter were much more evangelical than their predecessors.* It was far otherwise in the north of Italy—in Lombardy and Piedmont. Here you have, since the most ancient times, a vigorous opposition to the bad doctrines and bad practices of Rome, but upon the field of a practical life. You find, at no time, any traces of Manicheanism, of Gnosticism, or of Paulicianism. The "Noble Lesson," which dates from the 12th century, sets forth very simply, but most faithfully, the evangelical doctrine, without mixture with heretical or sectarian ideas. It is the natural expression of the life of a little Church, faithful but humble, and which only demands to live in tranquility and unknown. This remarkable document (The Noble Lesson) could not be the production of sects agitated and having but little accord in the south of France, about the same epoch. At a later day, a contest more complete and sustained, of these adversaries of Rome, on both sides of the Alps, (Cottian and Maritime), exposed to the same murderous fire of the enemy, caused them to be, little by little, fused under the vivifying influence of the Word of God, which they encouraged themselves to study and to circulate in the language of the people. It was, however, at a still later day that the translations were made in France into the Provencal languages. There is one fact that ought to strike every impartial mind, and which confirms what has been said; it is, that the Waldenses of Piedmont have been at least as cruelly treated as those of France; and yet the long-continued and barbarous tortures of Rome never produced at any time any traces, even the slightest, of fanaticism among the evangelical Christians of Piedmont; whilst in France there have been, in all the times of religious movement, instances of extraordinary excitement and fanaticism, even down to the days of the Camisards. [N. Y. Observer.

* A remarkable Poem, written in the Provencal language, which contains a history of the Church from the creation of man down till the 11th century.

MAZZINI ON THE WAR.

The Pensiero Azione (M. Mazzini's paper) being suspended in consequence of the outbreak of the war the editor addresses to his readers a farewell article, in which the following passages occur: "Italy craves for national unity; Louis Napoleon can have no such object in view. He covets, besides Nice and Savoy, which Piedmont has already conceded to him as the price of the alliance, to obtain also an opportunity for the creation of a throne in the south, whereon to place Murat, and a throne in Central Italy for his cousin. Rome, and a portion of the Roman States, are to remain as the temporal dominions of the Pope. Italy would be divided into four estates. Two would be governed directly by the foreigner; indirectly, France would have all Italy, the Pope being a French dependent since 1849; and the Sardinian King becoming, by the obligation of gratitude, and inferiority of forces, the vassal of the French empire."

In the same article Mazzini warns the world of the plans Russia meditates against Turkey and declares his opinion that the two Czars," though opposed to each other in heart," have united for the purpose of suffocating the aspirations of liberty and of imperializing entire Europe.

THE LATE KING OF NAPLES.

The King of Naples is dead, at last; and his son Francis is King. His reign has been a long one; but he succeeded to the throne at the age of twenty, in the year 1830. He would not be fifty years old until January next, and in November would have reigned twenty-nine years. For that long it has been a reign inglorious to himself, and afflicting to his subjects. They have groaned under the most absolute and grinding of despotisms, maintained by the most revolting persecutions and cruelties, for every expression of free opinion, or manifestation of repugnance to the will of the despot. But for his foreign alliance, and the overshadowing weight which Austria was bound by treaty to bring to his assistance, for the suppression of revolt, King Ferdinand would have long since been driven from his dominions by his own exasperated people. The successor to the throne is Francis, Duke of Calabria, Prince Royal, who takes the name of Francis II. Very frequently, in monarchies, the people suffering under an oppressive government try to find solace, in the hope that a new reign will bring some relief, especially if the heir to the throne is young, and of unformed character. In this case there is no prospect of change from the disposition of the new King. Though only twenty-three years of age he is known to have confirmed ideas of governing as tyrannical as his father, and is accused of having a temper as cruel and unrelenting. He lives, however, in a time when the foundations which upheld his father's despotism, are breaking up, and the power of Austria to maintain him, is passing away. He may be compelled to reform the Government or run the hazards of revolution, and may not be permitted to make his choice. In the excitement which the Sardinian war has created in the Italian States, the King of Naples may be suddenly called to pay the penalty for his father's sins and his own inherited unpopularity.

The late King Ferdinand was married twice. His first wife was the daughter of the late King of Sardinia, and sister or cousin, but we believe sister, of the present King. His second wife was an Austrian Archduchess, One of his sisters is the celebrated Duchess de Berri, who, but for the assassination of that Prince, would have been Queen of France; another is the notorious Christine, the Queen Mother of Spain. His mother was sister of the late King of Spain, and his father's sister was the wife of Louis Philippe, last Queen of the French. The Neapolitan Bourbons have intermarried with almost every royal house in Europe. Picayune.

For weeks before his death, the King of Naples, nicknamed Bomba—whose death we announced last week—is said to have been one horrid putrifying mass, the brain alone retaining vigor. In regard to his last hours, we have the following from a European paper: His physicians held out to him no hope of life, but he heeded them not. The pope sent to him—probably in acknowment of his hospitable reception at Gaeta in 1848—some relics and a piece of the blessed shirt, which is supposed to have miraculous gifts. The moribund king clung to these as a drowning man will grasp at a straw, and would not believe that with these relics by him, and with the masses that were hourly offered up for his recovery, the king of terrors could seize him for his own. Vain delusion! That pale death which with equal tread steps to the door of the palace and of the cottage, came and summoned from his sumptuous palace the second of the Neapolitan Ferdinands, and that summons who can stay?

The title of "Bomba" is thus accounted for: In the revolutionary movement of May, 1848, a portion of the population of Naples took sides with the army. So also did the National Guard when the cries of vive la republique were heard. The insurrection was overthrown, With it fell the constitution. Between the radicals and the government the constitutional party was crushed out. The radicals strove to carry the insurrection into Calabria, but failed in that too. It was then that the nickname of "Bomba" was applied to Italy against Ferdinand, to whom they applied the epithet of bombardatore, because he had ordered the troops to bombard the city. That epithet abbreviated into "Bomba," has since been generally used to designate him.

Bomba has a Eulogist—the Paris Univers thus discourses of the late King of the Two Sicilies: Ferdinand II was beloved by his people. He was beloved because he was known to be full of solicitude for what is right; beloved, because he entertained a high opinion of the dignity of his crown and of the independence of his States; beloved, on account of the family and household virtues, of which he was a model; beloved on account of his sincere piety, of his attachment to the Apostolic See, and Sovereign Pontiff; and lastly, because he admirably represented the national sentiment and the people were worthy of each other—the King, by maintaining, even against the strongest, the honor and liberty of his crown; and the people and the army, by re-establishing authority when it was shaken, and resisting the culpable intrigues of revolutionists by crushing odious attempts at insurrection, by surrounding the Prince with the most respectful affection, and by offering, during his long and fatal malady the touching tribute of their tears and prayers.

THE AUSTRIAN DOMINIONS.

In an article two days since we described the relations of Austria to the German States as a member of the German Confederation. Her territories out of the confederation are much larger and have a much greater population than those within it. We have not access to the statistics of population for the same date among all these states—only approximations in some cases; and when the actual enumerations are found, they are of different dates. The comparative result is nearly this:

The German Confederation contains an aggregate population of about 42,000,00; of these, Austria governs about 13,000,000—less than one-third.

The aggregate population of all the Austrian States was, in 1857, nearly 40,000,000.

The Austrian subjects are, therefore nearly one-third German, and two-thirds non-German. One-third of Germany is Austrian.

The area of Austria is given in the geographies at 258,262 square miles, of which her German provinces cover 76,147 square miles—not quite one third of the Austrian territory.

Kossuth, in his late address, exaggerated the disproportion of the German element in Austria, and stated broadly that there were but seven millions of Germans in all Austria. He was counting heads and not communities. The States and communities, which anciently belonged to the German Empire, but now to Austria, in which the German element preponderates decidedly, contain a population of nearly twice that which Kossuth assigns to them; that is, according to the enumeration last made.

The German States of Austria were distinctly enumerated by the Emperor Francis, in the official act dated in 1818, by which he formally acceded to the German confederation. They were—1. The Archduchy of Austria, the Duchy of Styria. 2. The Duchies of Karnthan, (Carinthia,) Krain, (Carniola,) Friaul, (Friuli,) which makes up the Kingdom of Illyria. 3. The Duchy of Saltzburg. 4. The Kingdom of Bohemia. 5. Moravia and Austrian Silesia. 6. The Duchies of Auschwitz and Zata, on the northern frontier near Cracow—which politically German, are really parts of ancient Poland.

The city and territory of Trieste part of the Kingdom of Illyria, are named separately, as federal territory, embraced within the German Confederation.

The dominions of Austria which are not German, include a great number of different nationalities. They contain not far from twenty-seven millions of inhabitants, composed of Poles, Hungarians and Italians. The Polish element is found in what is called the Kingdom of Gallicia—Austrian share of the spoil of dismembered Poland. The Hungarian element is found in the three provinces entitled the Kingdom of Hungary, (proper) Slavonia and Croatia, containing a mixed population of Magyars and Slavi, with a considerable admixture of Germans (about two millions.) Transylvania has a separate government from Hungary.

The whole frontier territory of Austria, from the Adriatic up to Moldavia, in Turkey, is organized upon a military footing, distinct from the territorial government, within which it lies. The inhabitants pay no other taxes than by military services, and they are kept constantly on a war footing, subject to service at four hours' notice, as a cordon of defense against the Turks. Another portion of the Austrian territory is the Kingdom of Dalmatia, so called, which embraces the narrow strip of coast on the eastern side of the Adriatic, in some places only two or three miles wide, inhabited by a Slavic race, and dependent formerly on the Republic of Venice.

The extra-German territories of Austria in Italy consists of the Kingdom of Lombardy and Venice, and contain nearly 6,000,000 of Italians.

Classed as communities, the population of Austria is usually divided in about these proportions: German, 13,000,000; Polish, 5,500,000; Hungarian, etc., 15,500,000; Italian, 6,000,000.

Classed according to their origin, there are computed to be over 7,000,000 of German descent, about 18,000,000 of Sclavi, (which includes Poles, Bohemians, etc.,) 5,000,000 Magyars, about as many of the Roumany tribes in the east, and a large number of Jews.

It is in these discordant materials, conglomerated together, rather than consolidated or united, that Kossuth, in his late English speeches, looks for the causes of an early dismemberment of the Austrian Empire, by its own inherent weakness, if it be not supported and kept together by the pressure of outside political support; and if France and Sardinia be permitted to wage their own quarrel, to what he thinks the legitimate conclusion, of the wiping out of Austria, as an empire from the map of Central Europe.—Picayune.

IMPORTANT INQUIRY.

Ma. Editor:—How is it, that with the excellent Dr. McFerrin at the head of our publishing interests, we have not been able for two months to obtain a single copy of as necessary an article as a "24 mo—sheepskin, bound Hymn-book?"—Please answer, and oblige

May 28. KENTUCKY CONFERENCE BOOK-DEPOSITORY.

The above was handed to me by the editor of the Advocate. I take pleasure in answering. Twelve months ago "Dr. McFerrin" came into office. It was reported that there were thirty thousand Hymn-books in the Publishing-house. Many of these had been on the shelves for months; perhaps years. Many other books were in store awaiting some patriotic Methodist purchaser; but the sales were comparatively few, and my worthy predecessors had engaged "outside" work to keep the presses going. Several large jobs were on hand. They were finished after a season, but in the meantime a brisk trade sprung up; the Depositories went into operation; the Sunday-school cause received a new impetus; new books were offered us; old editions began to run short; and thanks be to Providence, it looked as if we were about to run out of books, especially our standard publications. The Discipline—which had to be laid over till after the action of the Annual Conferences on the rule on slavery—Hymn-books, (especially 24 mos,) Watson's Dictionary, Biographical Sketches, Wesley's Sermons, Tongue of Fire, Catechisms, Sunday-school books, Sundy-school Hymns, etc., which had lain on the shelves till all became discouraged, were now ordered by the thousands. Our "mill was soon thronged," and our customers had to wait "their turn;" but, like all mill customers when their grist could not be ground, they grew impatient with the miller, and were induced to think the machinery deficient.

Now, our mill goes by steam, and we have lost but two working days in twelve months. Every particle of machinery which "Dr. McFerrin" found in the Publishing-house is and has been for months, at work and still we cannot grind out each man's "turn" as soon as he wants it. "Outside work" is turned off, in a great measure, new works are postponed, and up go the presses an Hymns, Disciplines, Sunday-school books, etc.

The fact is, we shall have to procure more presses, especially if the zeal of our brethren for the publication of our books continue to burn.

I am sorry that all the orders of our brethren cannot be filled at once, but I thank God for the increased demand for Methodist literature. Let brethren be patient, and we will put on more steam and meet all their wishes—if we can. J. B. McFERRIN, Agent.

A WORD IN SEASON.

A few months ago, a country merchant came to make his regular purchases. He was a man whose credit was good, and his business talent more than respectable; but his manners were brusque, approaching to rudeness, and his language startled every sensitive ear by its profanity. A Christian merchant, with whom he had traded for years, had been often pained by this want of reverence; but knowing well the character of the man, and fearing to offend him by any reproof, had kept silence. On this occasion, however, with a conscience quickened, and a heart made tender by the special presence of the Divine Spirit in the city, he felt constrained to speak. The language of his customer, seemed more reckless and profane than ever before, and he asked very kindly if he was aware how such language jarred on the ears of others.

The country merchant looked surprised, and asked in reply if he talked worse than people generally.

"Many of your friends are grieved at your growing profanity," was the answer, "and fear that the habit will soon become incurable."

"You are not in earnest, are you? Am I really very profane?"

"Your language has often pained me, and others, very deeply; but we feared speaking to you about it, lest you should be angry, and think it officious."

"I thank you with all my heart for your kindness, and will try to guard myself in the future. I have always prided myself on being thought independent and manly, but I did not suppose I was considered very profane."

The mind of the Christian was greatly relieved. A heavy load was taken from his conscience. He had administered reproof kindly but faithfully, and it had been received in quite a different spirit from what he had anticipated. He had little hope, however, of a complete reform; for the habit so long indulged, and so in accordance with the natural disposition of the man, was not likely to be soon eradicated.

A few days afterwards, however, a friend met him, and while speaking of the wonderful revivals prevailing in many parts of the country, told him that a work of grace was making many converts in P., among a class of hardened persons rarely reached by the influences of the gospel.—Among these converts, added he, is our old acquaintance M——, whom you remember as a profane, ungodly man. The Christian merchant was filled with wonder and thankfulness, (and his heart was more impressed with the power of Divine grace,) that his brief admonition had led the country trader to thoughtfulness, and in that state of mind he had gone to the sanctuary, unvisited previously for many years, and had there been awakened and converted. He felt then, as never before, the importance of sowing beside all waters.—Watchman and Reflector.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

AN EXHORTATION TO CHRISTIANS.

Who shall essay to estimate the value of life's precious moments, which, as they rapidly flit away, speak in hurried strains of eternity? Would that man could experience, while in the bloom and vigor of youth, the feelings and emotions of one who is about launching out into the vastness, the unbounded space of eternity, to stand before the flaming bar of God and render up his account of a life that has been spent in idleness, frivolity and forgetfulness of his Creator. What a glorious reformation would soon be wrought among all grades and classes of men. The infidel would soon renounce his infidelity; the atheist, acknowledge without a blush the existence of an all-wise and Supreme Being; the scorner, bow in humble adoration at the foot of the cross; and the profaner of God's name, lift up his voice in sweet melodies and enthusiastic strains for the furtherance and ultimate predominancy of the great and worthy "cause."

The path of life is a hard one. Pleasure, luxury, and the gorgeous splendor of ambition's imaginary fabrications stand out lofty and alluring, to tempt the soul, to cease its laborious struggles for future happiness—enjoy the present moment, and die with its ephemeral shadows, its delusive images of human grandeur and power. We seem to be unaware of the weighty responsibility that rests upon each one of us, of the great and lasting good that might be effected were every professor of religion to exert all his energies and talents for the promotion of Christ's Gospel, and the conversion of sinners from the "error of their ways." Many there are, indeed, who, though they are nominally "followers of the Lamb," yet, as it were, lie supinely on their backs, hugging the delusive phantom that Heaven can be reached

"On flowry bed's of ease."

There is a great work for each one to do, and life on account of its brevity, requires activity. D. N. BARON.

OUTRAGE ON AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY IN TURKEY.

The Levant Herald, of April 27th, an English paper published at Constantinople, gives the following account, derived from a correspondent, of an outrage committed by a Turkish soldier on Dr. Prettyman, an American missionary:

"When returning to Shumla from a short ride in the suburbs, he (Dr. P.) came upon a park of artillery, planted on the roadside, and guarded by a sentinel at each extremity. Attracted by this unusual spectacle, he reined in his horse about ten paces from the cannon to examine into the cause, when his meditations were terminated by a cruel blow from the sabre of one of these sentinels, aimed at his head, but cutting through the clothes and muscles of his arm down to the bone, severing nerves of the thumb and index finger, by which they are completely paralyzed. This unprovoked assault is one which aroused all our indignation; the more so, as it has been perpetrated by that undisciplined class of soldiers which infest the streets of Constantinople, and whose insults have rendered even the crowded thoroughfares hardly safe for European ladies. We hope the American Minister will demand the immediate punishment of the scoundrel, and teach them a lesson not soon to be forgotten."

The Rev. Mr. Prettyman is a member of the Methodist Mission in Bulgaria, and resides with his family at Shumla. He is an estimable man, and not disposed to give offence to any one.

SYMPATHISERS WITH THE SOUTH.

A Southerner's patience hardly survives these discussions. Preposterous nonsense and insult are on the face of them. The South—what can be done for the poor benighted South? is ever the impertinent theme upon hypocritical lips. Their very expressions of friendliness are offensive and patronizing. Among the fare most of these societies that have taken the ease of South in hand, and go about begging alms among her own people for her, is the Southern Aid Society. Headquarters in some Northern city, and that mistaken, clever man, Dr. Styles, chief mourner. The object of this Society, professed and ostensible, is to help the South to the preached gospel; and its open plea is that her ministry, as compared with that of the North is uneducated and her people weak and neglected.

Never before did we feel so gratified with a Southern Methodist Publishing-house. Give us the contributions which the American Tract Society, and the American Sunday-school Union, and others, draw annually from Southern pockets and income, and our Book Agent shall make books as cheap as theirs, make better books, and have them to give away! We will publish for our Northern friends a book they have not, and yet much need—tied ladies to their own poor, starving in garrets, and to their hired servants, often ground down in wages below subsistence-point, and, when sick and old, sent adrift to the almhouse or hospital.

CONTENTS OF THE LEADING PERIODICALS.

A monthly publication has been commenced in London, The Literary Record, the object of which is to present indices of the contents of the principal Magazines and Reviews. The prospectus says truly, "much of the best writing and many of the best thoughts uttered in our language, may be found in several of our weekly, monthly and quarterly periodicals." Besides the magazines, the Times is to be taken in hand and indexed. Such a work, if faithfully carried out, will be highly valuable. The project of a general index to the periodicals was, we believe, first undertaken in this country by Mr. Poole, now of the Boston Athenæum, the successive enlarged editions of whose work are looked for with interest.

THE WAR IN ITALY—THE SYMPATHY OF AMERICA.

The Bee explains why our sympathies are on the side of the Italians and the French in the present contest between them and Austria. The subject is vigorously presented in the following statement: We do not care to look beyond the grand object of the war in Italy. We see Austria striving to punish Sardinia for taking sides with the Lombardo-Venetian provinces, and endeavoring to rivet the chains in which their afflicted inhabitants are held. We behold the gallant and chivalrous monarch of Sardinia defying the grim and ruthless Hapsburger, and France stretching forth her mighty arm in support of feeble Italy. There can be but one feeling in the heart of every genuine American, and it must be in favor of the oppressed people who are fighting for freedom. Let us not be told that when Austria is driven back to her immediate domain, and forced to relinquish her grasp of Italy, France will intrigue to retain a permanent influence over the disenthralled peninsula. We know nothing of this—we believe that Louis Napoleon is sincere in his declaration of a desire to restore Italian nationality, and that he will not seek to obtain territorial aggrandizement, because, to say nothing of his honor, his interest is totally against the policy. But even if it were otherwise—if Italy could cease to be Austrian only by becoming French—we say this should not abate our kindly sympathies in her behalf. We doubt whether there is an inhabitant of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom who would not a thousand fold prefer the enlightened absolutism of the French rule to the inexorable, brutal and hideous domination of the House of Hapsburg. But this is not the point under consideration. The simple issue is whether as Americans our full and unreserved sympathies are not due to Italy. We maintain they are.

SINGING OF BIRDS.

The singing of most birds seems entirely a spontaneous effusion, produced by no lassitude in muscle, or relaxation of the parts of action. In certain seasons and weather, the nightingale sings all day and most part of the night; and we never observe that the powers of song are weaker, or that the notes become harsh and unmusical, after all these hours of practice. The song thrush, in a mild, moist April, will commence his tune early in the morning, pipe unceasingly through the day, yet, at the close of eve, when he retires to rest, there is no obvious decay in his musical powers, or any sensible effort required to continue his harmony to the last. Birds of one species sing in general very like each other, with other with different degrees of execution. Some countries may produce finer songsters, but without great variation in the notes. In the thrush, however, it is remarkable that there seems to be regular notes, each individual piping a voluntary of its own. Their voices may always be distinguished amid the choristers of the corps, yet same one performer will more particularly attract attention by a peculiar modulation of tone; and should several stations of these birds be visited the same morning, few or none probably would be found to persevern in the same round of notes; whatever is uttered seeming the effusion of the moment. At times a strain will break out perfectly unlike any preceding utterance, and we may wait a long time without noticing any repetition of it. Harsh, strained, and terse as the notes of this bird are, yet they are pleasing from their variety. The voice of the black-bird is infinitely more mellow, but has much less variety, compass, or execution; and he, too, commences carols with the morning light, persevering from hour to hour without effort, or any sensible faltering of voice. The cuckoo wearies us throughout some long May morning with the unceasing monotony of its song; and though there are others as vociferous, yet it is the only bird I know that seems to suffer from the use of the organs of voice. Little exertion as the few notes it makes use of seems to require, yet, by the middle or end of June it loses its utterance, becomes hoarse, and ceases from any further essay.

CASHMERE SHAWLS.

Mr. John B. Ireland, of New York, when in Cashmere, a few years since, visited Mookti Shah, who is the best and greatest manufacturer of shawls in that city: The factory was a miserable dirty building; the workroom measuring about sixty by thirty feet. Here he found some forty men and boys of all ages, from six to fifty, arranged in twos and threes, at different looms, each one having a loom to himself, for all the most valuable shawls are made in looms, in small pieces, according to the patterns, and then sewed together. The pattern is not put in colors and squares like our patterns of worsted-work for chair-backs, seats or slippers, but the directions are written. When the patterns are made they are all sewed together. At some looms in operation there appeared to be four or five hundred small pins of wood with rolls of different shades of woolen thread, to be used in different parts of the pattern. It was astonishing to see the dexterity with which the small children worked these hand-looms, and understood their written directions.

Most of the people were at work on a magnificent shawl for the Empress Eugenie of France. It had a white ground or centre, and would be the most elegant specimen of Cashmere work Mootki-Shah ever produced. He told Mr. Ireland that thirty men had been steadily at work on it for six months, and that it would require three months more to finish it. That is, 8250 days work were bestowed on this one shawl. The price when finished would be about 1300 rupees, or $650. Such a shawl would sell for about $4000 in London or New York.

THE FRENCH PRESS.

The Paris correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, in his letter of May 26th, writes:

"Previous to his departure for the army, the Emperor, by special decree, created a distinct and seperate "Direction" at the Ministry of the Interior, to which is entrusted the superintendence of the daily press and all other forms of publication. M. de la Guerronniere, a Counsellor of State, and the same person who acted as Louis Napoleon's amanuensis in the composition of "Napoleon III. et l'Italie," and former pamphlets, is placed at the head of this new department; one immediate result of which is to withdraw the press from the control of the general police. People are asking anxiously whether more than this is intended, and whether the Emperor thinks the moment is arrived for relaxing the iron hands of "warnings" and "suspensions," by which freedom of thought, and expression is at present stifled. There seems some hope that something of the kind is intended, and that at all events a more liberal regime is about to be constituted. The Nord, of yesterday, in an article of great boldness, which was allowed to be distributed, attacks the present repression system, and declares it to be high time for the French press to regain its freedom and influence. News verrons; but it is almost too good news to prove true.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN SYNOD.

That portion of the New School Presbyterian Church which seceded from the main body at the General Assembly held in Cleveland a year ago, have been holding their annual meeting at Lynchburgh, Va., commencing 17th inst., and closing on the 24th. The General Synod comprises three particular Synods, viz: Virginia, Tennessee and Mississippi. One of the prominent topics of discussion was the establishment of a Theological Seminary in connection with the General Synod. The measure was finally resolved on, and it was voted that the Seminary should be located in the vicinity of the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, Albemarle County. The vote was unanimous.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Forty Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM DR. YOUNG.

From Savanah I returned to New York by Steam-Ship. I had for room-mate Dr. Copp, a Congregational minister from the vicinity of Boston—a pleasant agreeable gentleman. We had a stormy head-wind, and I suffered from sea-sickness all the way. We reached New York last Saturday night. In the morning I had the pleasure of again meeting my friend Dr. Marshall, but found him laboring under an attack of neuralgia, and not able to preach; so we went to hear Dr. McClintock, and for my part I was considerably disappointed. In the evening, Dr. Marshal was too unwell to go out, and, without knowing where the Academy of Music was to be found, I went upon the street and followed the largest crowd until I found myself in the most commodious and gorgeous room in the city. Dr. Hopkins was announced to preach. "Who is Dr. Hopkins?" I asked of a gentleman sitting next to me, who had the air of the city about him. "I don't know," said he, "but he is the President of a College; and a very talented man, or they would not have invited him to preach here."

His subject was the true riches. The discourse was delivered with great earnestness, but otherwise the manner and delivery were faulty and disagreeable in the extreme. The congregation sang well. I cast my eye around the hall; it was well nigh filled; the people were all well dressed, belong to the better classes of society, and are evidently church going people. The ostensible object of opening this popular hall for Sabbath preaching, was to induce hearers who do not attend worship in any of the churches regularly dedicated to the service of God. Really, it is a magnificent theatre for the exhibition of Star Preachers; and that immense congregations are appreciative hearers, gathered from the various churches whose congregations are diminished the exact number of those who seek pleasure every Sabbath evening in listening to studied discourses, and measured periods at the Academy of Music.

The poor do not go there; and there is abundant room in the city of New York, within the walls of elegant houses erected and dedicated exclusively to the service of God, where the rich may go and enjoy the luxury of worshiping upon cushioned seats, to the swelling sound of trained voices and pealing organs. The way to preach the gospel to the poor in our large cities, is to gather them on the Sabbath in their work-shops and foundries, on board of steam boats and ships, in railroad depots and market houses; and pious zealous exhorters, by trade carpenters, moulders, conductors and engineers will find a hearing, and be useful in the conversion of their associates, where Doctors of Divinity and professors of Belles Lettres would scarcely be appreciated.

Among other things to be seen in New York, we visited the Dusseldorf Gallery of Paintings; by far the finest in America, and the best of this school of painting in the world. The paintings are said to have cost two hundred and thirty thousand dollars. There are 112 in the collection. Among the most interesting is The Martyrdom of John Huss—a painting to be studied and admired. The martyr, in the attitude of prayer lifts, his eyes to Heaven and seems to gain strength of purpose, while his countenance is illumined by faith in the Redeemer. The grouping of his friends and enemies is admirable; while the expression of hatred and revenge, or of sorrow and compassion leave no room to mistake. An old Franciscan Monk looking at Huss through his spectacles, seems filled with curiosity. Sir John Falstaff Mustering his Recruits, is a work worthy of the subject; and few will look upon the fair proportions of the fat, swaggering, impudent, jolly old Knight, without feeling in a better humor for it. The Duke of Alba and the Countess Catharine of Rudolstadt, is a striking picture.

Of this the Catalogue says: At the conclusion of the war between Charles V. and the Protestants of Germany, the Duke of Alba retreated through the small territory, of the Countess of Radolstadt, to whom the Duke announced himself for a dejeuner. When the guests were seated, the Countess was informed that the Spanish soldiers were plundering her subjects and driving their cattle away. She immediately armed all her servants, and said to the Duke: "My poor people must have their own again, or, by Heaven! I will have princely blood for oxen blood!" The Duke of Alba ordered immediate restoration. This is the scene which Volkhart has painted. It is a picture full of spirit, and has served Volkhart's reputation well.

But I have not time to particularize further; the Landscapes are very beautiful; but I derived most pleasure from The Adoration of the Magi. Whoever has any taste for fine paintings should go to New York to see this gallery, and while there, may as well go to see "The Heart of the Andes," by Church—the finest landscape ever painted.

While in New York we heard Rev. Henry Ward Beecher deliver his celebrated lecture, "The Commonwealth." Henry Ward Beecher is a character, an institution, a remarkable man—a man of great powers, and of great weaknesses; and this lecture, like his other productions, is characteristic of the man. His delivery is studied and highly artistic, and from it you derive a pleasure not often felt. His imagination is lively, and having thoroughly educated himself in the proper use of language he seems to possess an unlimited command over the most beautiful figure of speech; so he commands the attention of his hearers, and often captivates the judgement by his startling wit, his inimitable humor, and the eloquent and classical style in which he presents his ideas—ideas, which if stripped of the ornaments with which he decks them, and presented as plain unadorned logical propositions would appear too monstrous for the public gaze. In this way sentiments are concealed in this lecture, which, if it were possible for them to become generally diffused among the people, our government would not last twenty-four hours, nor could any government exist at all, except by a military despotism. He is a disorganizer of society, but he is difficient in judgment, and is wanting in that high resolution and determination of purpose and will, which have characterized the worlds benefactors and its conquerors, and made them either the terror or the admiration of their species. Content with the applause of his hearers, Henry Ward Beecher will never conceive any great and bold purpose, nor advocate his views with a force of character which should make him to be either feared or hated.

The Northern Methodist Church is in a broil upon the subject of slavery, and fear is entertained by a conservative portion of a division at the next General Conference; and several members of the Western Virginia Conference, with whom I traveled, seemed to think such a result inevitable. There is, undoubtedly, a portion of the preachers so infatuated upon the subject of abolitionism that they are determined to exclude all slaveholders from the Church and communion table. Failing in this, it is thought they will withdraw. In either event they will not be satisfied, but will proceed to deal with all who may chance to be in any manner connected with, or may in any way, ever so remotely and indirectly be supporters of what, with characteristic meekness they are pleased to call, "The sum of, all villainies." So if one shall wear a cotton shirt, or let his children sweeten their coffee with sugar produced by slave labor, he must be turned out of the Church for being a patron and supporter of "The sum of all villainies." We can scarcely imagine the extent to which fanaticism may carry people. If a poor man sell his little crop of corn to a distiller; if, to provide bread for his children, he should work in a foundry or machine shop upon an engine being built under contract for a distillery, or if he shall serve in any capacity a railroad or steamboat transporting ardent spirits—these fanatics will have him expelled from the Church. Many of them are in favor of turning over to Satan all who use tobacco in any way; and they may possibly revive an ancient law of Connecticut, only changing the penalty a little, and turn a man out of Church for kissing his wife on Sunday. On the other hand, the Conferences of the Church, North, located within the slave States, are determined to withdraw if the General Conference shall change in any respect the rule of the discipline upon this subject—even so much as to cross a t, or dot an i. They seem to think, that as they will occupy a middle ground the truth must be with them; and talk as if they thought all sensible men, North and South, will flock to their standard. I should sooner think these Conferences would become extinct in a few years; the larger portion of the members going over to the abolitionists where their sympathies, I think, will naturally carry them; a portion of them will locate, and a small residue join the Conference of the Church, South. For the most part, they would be quite as objectionable to us as the abolitionists.

There are a great many wise and pious men in the Church, North, and these are conservative; but they are likely to be overborne in this contest by the insane abolitionists aided by a few active, ambitious aspirants for the prelacy.

A controversy is now being carried on, in the Northern Church papers upon various questions of reform, but chiefly upon this absorbing one of slavery, which like the lean kine of the dreaming Monarch, swallows up everything else; and is conducted in a bitterness of feeling which shames the warfare of political partizan newspapers. They indulge "in all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor, and evil speaking—with all malice;" as if they were commanded to be unkind, hard-hearted, unforgiving, and to put away truth from among them, and deal falsely every man with his neighbor. The fact is the natural tendency of abolitionism is to demoralize religious sentiment, and corrupt the heart. So with all systems and isms which erect a standard of morality differing from the teachings of the Bible—of Jesus Christ, his Apostles. Many instances might be found, where abolitionism has unsettled the faith, and corrupted the lives of those who once had a name to live.

In one instance, in Ohio, a Presbyterian Minister who openly advocated the doctrines of the Abolitionists, and secretly engaged in stealing slaves from their Masters in Kentucky, and aiding their escape into Canada—until finally, his own daughter was found stealing, and was expelled from school for stealing a gold watch; and I was told, would have been prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary had it not been for the consideration of her father's position in society; and, recently, there is public talk of scandulous immoralities of the father. These are the natural fruits of such principles.

A Minister of Ohio, of more than half a century, told me, the abolition preachers in the North tell the people of their charges, that where rules are given in the New Testament for masters and servants, hired servants are always meant; and, he thought, great good might be done by the free circulation of a tract there, embodying these passages with a correct exposition of their meaning.

I was frequently asked what I thought of the expulsion of our Northern brethern from Texas. Well, I have said, the Church South had nothing to do with it—knew nothing of it until it was all over, and cannot therefore be in any way responsible for it. In fact, if we should do as they had done, the people of Texas would expel us too, and probably in the same summary manner. Our Southern states have laws against the propogation of abolition sentements in our midst, and against stealing our negroes; and I am in favor of enforcing the law, but I am opposed to all violation of our laws by our own people or any body else. But what would we think if, for instance, we had a church in Cincinnati and they should forcibly expel us from the State? The cases are not similar. The Church South, makes no war upon the civil institutions of Ohio, nor is there any thing in our ecclesiastical policy which can be urged as a bar to prevent us from going into all the world and preaching the Gospel to every creature. FOURTH DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOL EXHIBITION.

As usual on such occasions, the Church on Felicity St. was crowded a full hour before the time fixed for the exercises. For years past more people have been excluded than admitted to this annual treat, we could not but regret the oversight committed by the council in not giving us a second story to the new market-house on Magazine street. It might have been one of the most spacious Halls, in the United States, and built at a comparatively small additional expense.

We need not say that everything in the programme went off well, we have never known it otherwise. The boys knew their speeches. Having been greatly bored, one day, at school exhibitions by badly-committed orations, whenever we hear a young gentleman "go through" his speech smoothly it excites in us a measure of personal gratitude. The "parting address" was appropriate and unambitious in its conception, and was pronounced in a most natural and easy manner. Two speeches, one on the "Great West," the other upon "The Indians", were admirably spoken; the treatment was mature—indeed, quite creditable to older minds. The valedictory was in matter and manner excellent, though scarcely as much characterized by that simplicity, which it is presumed the emotions of a farewell occasion naturally suggest. Though we are not so sure that quitting school does give birth to much pathos. For ourself a severe night-mare generally takes the form of a schoolmaster.

The Dialogue at the conclusion was entertaining and well acted. It opened with a drinking scene, and ended with a fight—a logical subject and predicate. It is questionable with the facilities offered the youth in this city for seeing the thing itself at every corner coffee-house, if this delineation might not have been omitted without serious loss to the audience. The same disposition might be made of a certain "philosophic essay," which was, however, the most applauded of all. On such occasions, something humorous, is not only in place but demanded to give relief to the tension of the more sober parts of the exhibition; but from pleasant humour to the broad laugh, there is room for considerable descent; and great care is required not to mar the elevated expression which the graduating day should give of our most noble school system.

We have but little to say of the young ladies who graduated, though we felt greater interest in them than in the other side of the House. We could not hear in all two dozen sentences from them, though fortunately placed for hearing. We do not complain (in fact, would not have them otherwise than unequal to the effort of standing up before a large audience and making themselves heard. Surely the young ladies of the South are not "called" to the rostrum. It is the usual way, we know, throughout the South to have composition read aloud by the young lady-graduates; and, may be, where the audience is small, this course might not be very objectionable; but we suggest to our School directors the propriety of an independent step in a direction which we feel sure will be approved by every parent who has either seen his own daughter, or the daughter of his neighbor, trembling on the platform before the gaze of a large audience.

We go to these annual exhibitions to enjoy that rare treat—good music. With an uneducated ear, and still as we trust with some remaining sense for musical sounds, we find ourself entirely unequal to a large portion of what the best judges call fine music—such for instance, as one occasionally hears at Odd Fellows Hall. Often on such occasions we have concluded either that the soul had been lost out of music, or we had lost our musical soul. But give us the voice of the girls in those brilliant and sweet measures with the modest accompaniament, it may be, of a violin and a piano, before all the elaborate Monsieurles who ever agonized an instrument, tortured an audience, or fretted the patient air. The music of the day still rings through the winding chambers of our ear.

To the President and Directors of the School Board, to the Superintendant, and to the Teachers, it is enough to say, that it required on that day and on the previous days of examination no very sharp eye to see and appreciate on all sides the results of their patience and devotion, their experience and qualification for the offices which they fill. We know of no institution which accomplishes more good than the Public Schools of the Fourth District.

The praise of the public we know to be but a small part of the reward which awaits those who so laboriously seek its welfare. But it is a satisfaction to us to speak, we doubt not, the thanks and the admiration of thousands who have been served by them, and who can only repay them in all the inadequacy of sincere thanks.

COMMENCEMENT AT TEXAS MILITALY INSTITUTE.

We had the pleasure, says the La Grange Texas True Issue, of being present at the Commencement Exercises of this Institution.

At an early hour, the people began to gather from all quarters. As far as the eye could see over the prairies, horsemen and carriages were making their way to that beautiful summit, which the Cadets have named "Mars Hill."

A drum rattles, the bugle blasts, and the Cadets, in their simply elegant uniform, are marched to the front seats, the Literary Society known by its badge, taking their right.

Two addresses and a humorous essay, with well chosen and appropriate music between, represented the Baconian Society.

Cadet Tarver, of Corpus Christi, opened with a manly speech upon "Self-made Men."

Cadet Bryan, of Brazoria, followed in a patriotic and energetic speech upon "Our Relations to other Governments."

Cadet Wood, of Montgomery county, closed the exercises of the Society with a highly humorous description of College Examinations.

After an intermission of 10 minutes, the Senior addresses were pronounced.

The class had two graduates out of the twelve, who were stated to have composed it in the beginning of the Sophomore year. These two were products of the Institute, having entered when the school first opened at Rutersville.

The first address was by J. I. Nuner, of Victoria, a Cadet-Captain, we understand, the first officer of the corps. His theme was "The Duty of the U. S. Government."

Mr. Nuner's speech was followed with a moment's pause by his salutatory—a tasteful compliment to his Alma Mater.

The second senior address was from Lieut. D. L. Russell, son of the President of the Board, (both these seniors are natives of Texas.) His subject was: "The Progress and Power of the Human Mind." His valedictory, followed and closed the exercises.

Conferring Degrees was preceded by a short address of Superintentent. Col. Forshey, to the Graduates. Each was then called up in Latin, and the formula pronounced, creating each a Bachelor of Arts.

An intermission of two hours, gave an opportunity for the demonstration of the hospitality for which the place is noted. The whole audience was dined.

Inspection.—In the afternoon, the inspection of arms (a short drill with the exactness of machinery in motion) and thorough inspection of quarters, preceded the literary exercises. The cadet-arms, were inspected and returned to the armory, until next session, and the corps, after forty weeks continuous study, was disbanded till the first Monday in September.

Again, at the tap of the drum, the cadets paraded, and escorted the Baconians to the front seat, and the audience were entertained for about forty minutes, with an address of great beauty and force, delivered by Mr. John Sayles, of Washington county.

A short, able, and animated address by the accomplished and gentlemanly Superintendant followed.

Thus ended the Commencement Exercises, at the end of the fourth year of its history.

NORTHERN METHODIST MISSION TO OREGON.

We learn from the Pacific Methodist that on Wednesday, June 1st, Rev. O. Fisher, Presiding Elder of the San Francisco District of the Pacific Conference, and Rev. J. C. Kolbe, late of the Texas Conference, with their families, started for Oregon. Their immediate destination is Salem and Independence, from which points they will visit other portions of the State, according to circumstances.

These ministers, says the Editor, are spared from the California work, only from a deep sense of the necessity of responding to the call of our brethren in Oregon to give them an organization of the Church whose principles and policy they approve and prefer. Our laborers are still too few. The increase of preachers has scarcely kept pace with the encouraging progress of the Church in California, for two years past. But, in view of all the circumstances of the case, and looking to the future as well as the present, it has been considered inexpedient to defer any longer raising our banner in Oregon. We cannot be indifferent to the Macedonian call. The response to that call involves a sacrifice. The labor thus diverted from the Pacific Conference is needed here, and our brethren go to Oregon only, because there it is needed more. This is a principle that must always be recognized in the operations of the Church. She is to send her ministry not only where they are needed, but where the demand for their labor is most urgent.

There are good reasons why there should be as little delay as possible in introducing our branch of the Church into the now unoccupied territory of the Pacific coast. Its religious bias and direction are now being given to it. The impress it now receives, it will bear, to a great extent, for an indefinite period.

Our brethren go to Oregon because they are needed and called for, because God's providence has opened the way, because their convictions of duty harmonize with the indications of that providence.

The absence of Bro. Fisher will be felt by us, especially as the camp-meeting season is now at hand. He leaves us with reluctance, but with a thorough conviction that duty requires him to go. A man may not fight against his destiny. Bro. Fisher is a pioneer constitutionally, and is destined to blaze new paths for the Church until he dies. Brn. Kolbe is a yoke-fellow, like-minded, true and tried. The prayers of the Church will accompany our brethren and their families on their mission.

We shall look with earnest hopefulness for the first fruits of our labors in Oregon, and expect to see the day when we shall have a Conference there, numbering more souls than are in the Pacific Conference now. The little one shall become a multitude.

There are many waiting for us in Oregon, for whom our coming would be too late if much longer delayed. May they with receptive hearts receive the message of God from His servants, who have gone from our midst to them, and in California and Oregon may we rejoice together in mutual progress this year.

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

Mr. Editor:—Our route from Memphis to Washington leads through the most sublime mountain scenery of our country. The Blue Ridge, with its stupendous rocky heights, wreathed with evergreen and slightly tinged with a blue haze, forms a bold and majestic out-line, upon a clear transparent sky redolent with life. The isolated "Peaks of Otter" rise like lofty Pyramids, in shape resembling Mount Tabor in Palestine—adding grandeur to these mountain solitudes. The bold precipitous activities of the mountain ridges bear a strong resemblance to those of the Jura in Switzerland, which border the beautiful lakes of Nuefchatel and Leman—but our vallies appear wider and equally rich in verdure. They are now waving in grain, nearly ready for harvest; and the rich fields of clover were falling beneath the hand of the mower, sending forth their fragrance upon the monotain air. Wide and extended fields of corn were spread out before the eye, walled in by the stupendous mountains which enrich the vallies by their streams, and form tributaries to our mighty river's. Little cottages adorn their banks; placed in the sunny nooks of these mountain fastnesses. Small towns are springing among the green trees along the way, and the white spires of the village churches show the march of civilization, and rural loveliness. And if we have not the artistic taste of foreign countries, we have that which is far better, religious and civil liberty, which gives impetus to thought and holds out objects of ambition to the most obscure, that they may look forward with hope, and an eye to the future as unlimited as the wealthiest of our lands. And the little log-cabin which swarm with its hatless and shoeless group, may have eyes looking out upon this great central railway which unites the Atlantic with the father of waters—which may penetrate the philosophical world and bring forth results to improve and benefit mankind upon a large scale. The great field of enterprise open in the Mississippi valley, hitherto unknown, and the rich resources of these mountains can be borne off upon the dark blue sea of the East or the mighty river of the West at all times of the year.

Signs of taste begin to appear among the people of these mountains, in the white-washed fences and little log-cabins, relieved by the dark green foliage of the rock-maple, a tree which supplies them with sugar from its sap in winter, and dense shade for comfort in the summer. Nature has thrown its treasures with an unsparing hand among these primeval forests. Fruits and flowers flourish in rich luxuriance. The road-side was clad with an embroidered robe of white daisies, forming a picturesque border for the mountain gorges.

Death still meets us, "in the wide waste or in the city full."

A labourer found at night dead upon the track—the second since we left Memphis. Although strangers, and unknown, and for whom none made enquiry—yet they filled a place in life's drama, and could not leave its scenes without the knowledge of him who numbers the hairs of our heads; and has made a provision for the souls of such, through the blood of Jesus, in the kingdom of Heaven, as ample as for the king upon his throne. To the poor is the gospel sent.

RICHMOND.

We spent a day in this interesting city, and had an opportunity of visiting its Capitol—the site of which is elevated and exceedingly beautiful, commanding an extensive prospect of the city and its environs. The building, is plain, but deeply interesting from its historic associations; possessing some relics of antiquity, connected with the noble patriots of the State who figured in the revolution." In its Legislative hall stands the first presidential chair, brought from England, which the father of our country honored by his presence. The portraits of Pitt, Earl of Chatham, and Jefferson ornament its walls—and everything around speak of the past, and encircles it with a halo of national glory which will never exspire.

The library was well furnished, and handsomely designed. The grounds around it were laid out in avenues and walks, shaded with magnificient trees of dense foliage; improvements were stil going on, to render it a most delightful retreat for promenade in summer evenings, with park-like beauty. It encloses within its grounds a superb monument to the memory of Washington, with its group of historical figures designed by our late American artist, Crawford, whose studio we saw in Rome last year.

The bronze equestrian statue of Washington stands upon its height, which is about sixty-feet, with a most imposing effect. The war-horse is of most magnificent proportions; the curve of the neck, with its swelling veins, the expanding nostrils, the champing of the bit and fire of the eye, give full expressions to the subject—while the rider with a calm self-possessed air of moral grandeur, displays the expansive brow of a conqueror, wreathed with undying fame. Around the base of the monument, upon the broad flight of marble steps, stand the pedestals for statues of the heroic and statesmen of the revolution. That of Patrick Henry is there, with the spirited expression of his commanding eloquence—and Benjamin Franklin who could bring the lightning from the clouds and turn the course of the elements by his rod. When the whole group is completed, it will be one of the most chaste and classical work of the age an honor to the nation and State.

WASHINGTON,

The Metropolis of our country, increases in interest and beauty every year. The improvement in public buildings is very great. The new Patent, office is magnificent; and its arrangements within, will compare with those of any country—it is a palace for the repository of its articles, where they are easily seen in glass cases, which add to its beauty. The number and variety of its articles are like the sands of the sea. The case which contains Washingtons camp-furniture, his coats and suits of armour, are looked upon with almost a holy veneration—as simple in appearance as David, with his sling to smite the giant Goliah, the Philistine. There are many objects of interest in these arched halls, of elegance and taste. The buildings of the treasury is a noble specimen of Grecian architecture with its long row of Ionic columns.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTE,

Of the Norman style, is very beautiful in contrast, and it is destined to occupy a high position in the future advancement of our country in the progress of science, literature, and the fine arts, where free lectures are given in every branch.

Stanley's gallery of paintings is very interesting, and occupies one entire room at the end of a building, filled with the portraits of the aborigines of America. They are masterly productions, characteristic of the various tribes of the wilderness, with their custom and costumes, most admirably executed.

MR. CORCORAN'S PRIVATE MANSION—THE BANKER.

Is worthy of admiration—his hall of paintings contains some of the first specimens of Italian artists, seen in our country; to view them, it seemed like walking in the splendid palaces of Rome, filled with the works of genius. The Annunciation, was of surpassing beauty and angelic lovelines. The Adoration of Magi, was a perfect gem. The walls were filled with designs from the first masters of art, in all their variety, where the canvas was made redolent with life and beauty, with their richest colorings; and the Hall was most happily designed for a display of their charms, by the light coming in from above.

At the end of this magnificent room was a recess with latticed bow-window of large dimensions, where Power's Greek Slave stood, radiant with her own grace, and beauty, in the majesty of sublime innocence—the very centre of attraction—the climax of the whole! The garden—with its gravel walks, grass plots, flower-beds, and borders, with cool, shady retreats—was an earthly paradise. The conservatories stored with rare exotics, and fruits—and where the grapes hung in rich clusters, ripening for use—and the, Peach in its delicious mellowness was falling from the trees, perfuming the air with its fragrance. It was delightful to see the improvements of art keeping pace with the natural production of a sunny clime.

Our friend, Dr. S. Loomis, speaks highly of the benevolence of this millionaire, who contributes liberally, he says, to the wants of the poor—and it is hoped that the Hon. Mr. Enstace of our Crescent City, his son-in-law, will imitate his worthy example and become a benefactor of the age.

GENERAL CASS' RESIDENCE,

Is one of the deepest interest, not far from the other. It is almost a museum of the fine arts; stored with specimens of sculpture, which were found in the ruined villa's of Rome, the rarest productions of genius. They were tastefully arranged in five different rooms, where the mind could revel in the luxuary of thought, with historic and poetic associations clustering around them, with peculiar pleasure. The collection of antique statuary, was as extensive as it was beautiful. Among the busts were, Septimus, Severus and his wife, Titus and Nero, Hadrian, Scippio, Hannibal, the Cæsars, Achilles, Columbus, Marcus Poln, Beatrice, the Virgin and the Savior—a work of the third century. A Statue of the Venus de Midici and a statuette of the Martyr, St. Cecelia, lying dead upon a stone, with the impression of the string upon her neck, with her face upon the marble—and features only discernible by the mirror which reflects them where she lies—a rare work of art. A large Mosaic table, from a floor in the palace of Nero. Other tables of most exquisite Mosaics, of finely colored marbles. Medallion portraits of the Apostles, designed in the second or third centuries. The walls were hung with paintings of historic and classic interest, but they were all covered for preservation, during the summer—we saw but a few of them. But the sculptured forms of beauty were enough for the study of one day without any thing more. We were most politely treated by Miss Cass, the grand-daughter of the General, who conducted us through all the rooms, and explained the subjects with the most graceful simplicity and gentleness of manners.

THE GREAT COPPER ROCK.

This specimen of solid ore, is an object of great curiosity, lying upon the ground between the Navy and War Department. It was purchased from the Indians by Gen. Cass, and brought from Lake Superior at an expense of several thousand dollars to this city, to be kept as a relic. It is invested with a particular interest, from a legend associated with the traditions of the Indians. It was called the rock of sacrifice, where they believed the Great Spirit resided, and each tribe brought a yearly sacrifice of a virgin, to appease his wrath or secure his favor. The surface of the rock appears as if used for the purpose.

THE PIC-NIC AT THE GREAT FALLS OF THE POTOMAC.

We joined a very interesting party, composed of Mr. L. C. Loomis, President of the LaFayette Institute of this city, and his teachers, with the young ladies of their school, for an excursion to the falls twelve miles above Georgetown. We enjoyed the prospect of this stupendous work of nature very much, which must rank with the first class, among the objects of natural grandeur in our country. Although they are little known from their inaccessible position, yet this difficulty is obviated in a measure by a canal steam-boat, which conveys passengers, affording them ample time to view the wild and romantic scenery on both sides of the river, and portions of the famous Washington Aqueduct, with its bridges and tunnels cut through tremendous rocky mountains on a magnificent scale; which, when finished, will be an achievement next to that of Croton, New York.

The great falls are not so astonishing from their height, as from the rush of waters through the rocky passes, which appear as if in some great convulsion of nature—a stupendous mountain of rocks had been torn asunder, to open in its deep gorges, channels for this river to pass, through which it rushes along like a mighty torrent—leaping, foaming, tumbling over precipices, one below another—winding about, and rushing in different directions—some might be of twenty feet, others less, all meeting below, but forming eddies among gigantic rocks and streams, rushing on nearly a mile with the thunder of a cataract, uniting at last to form the river.

We sat down upon shelving cliffs, which overhung the river about 70 feet high, to view the imposing scene. There were other rocks ranging along its sides, more smooth and perpendicular, over a hundred feet—with tall cedars growing out of their crevices, adding beauty to the wild romantic scene well worth a visit.

On our way from Georgetown, upon the banks of the Potomac, the rural cottage of Mrs. E. Southworth was pointed out to us, the celebrated authoress, who is now on a visit to Europe. S. B. Thomas.

MANNER IN PREACHING.

The importance of a just and impressive manner in preaching is well sustained by the following, from an English paper:

There is much in common between the tragic, actor and the popular preacher; but while the actor's power is generally the result of a studied elocution, the preachers is almost always native. A teacher of elocution would probably say that the manner of Chalmers, Guthrie, or Caird, was a very bad one; but it suits the man, and no other would produce a like impression. In reading the most effective discourses of the greatest preachers we are invariably disappointed.

We can see nothing very particular in those quotations from Chalmers which are recorded as having overwhelmingly impressed those who heard them. In short, an accessory, which in England is almost entirely neglected, is the secret of Scotch effect. Nor is it any degradation from an orator's genius, to say his power lies much less in what he says, than how he says it. It is saying that his weapon can be wielded by no other hand than his own. Manner makes the entire difference between Macready and the poorest stroller that murders Shakspeare. The matter is the same in the case of each. Each has the same thing to say; the enormous difference lies in the manner in which he says it. The greatest effects are recorded to have been produced by things which, in merely reading them, would not have appeared so very remarkable. Hallett tells us that nothing so lingered on his ears as a line from "Home's Douglas," as spoken by young Betty:

"And happy, to my mind, was he that died."

We have heard it said that Macready never produced a greater effect than by the simple words, "Who said that?" It is, perhaps, a burlesque of an acknowledged fact, to record that Whitefield could thrill an audience by saying 'Mesopotamia!' Hugh Miller tells us that he heard Chalmers read a piece which he (Miller) had himself written. It produced the effect of the most interesting; and its author never knew how fine it was till then. We remember well the feeling which ran through us when we heard Caird say, 'As we bend over the grave where the dying are burying the dead.' All this is the result of that 'gift of genius—to feel with the whole soul, and to utter with the whole soul. The case of Guzzizi shows that tremendous energy can carry an audience away without its understanding a syllable of what is said. Inferior men think loud roaring and frantic gesticulation produce that impression which genius alone can produce. But the counterfeit is wretched, and with all intelligent people, the result is derision and disgust."

MISSIONS, M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.

We are indebted to the Missionary Secretary for the completed report of Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, for the past year.

From the recapitulation we learn, that there are under our pastoral care:

I. In the destitute portions of our regular work, 161 missions; 175 missionaries; 31,419 white, and 1400 colored members; with 69 Churches, 138 Sabbath-schools, and 5790 scholars.

II. Among the people of color, 158 missions; 136 missionaries; 48,582 colored members; (the whole number of colored members in the M. E. Church, South, is 188,041;) with 74 Churches, and 19,553 children under religious instruction.

III. Among the Germans, 18 missions and 17 missionaries; 877 members, 10 Churches, 11 Sunday-schools, 476 scholars.

IV. Among the Indian Tribes, 29 missions; 32 missionaries; 4283 members; 40 Churches; 29 Sabbath-schools; 1102 scholars; 8 manual-labor schools, and 480 pupils.

V. China Mission, 3 missionaries and their families. Members not reported.

General Aggregate.—Missions, 388; Missionaries, 362; Churches, 194; Church-members, 86,621; Sunday-schools, 178; Children under religious instruction, 26,922; Manual-labor Schools, (Indian,) 8; Indian Pupils, 480.

CHURCH IN SAN FRANCISCO.

We are emerging, says the Pacific Methodist, from the clouds that have hung over us in this city. Since the removal into Pine street, there has been a steady increase of the congregation, and a constantly increasing religious interest has encouraged the hearts of our little flock. Some valuable accessions have been made to the Church; the Sabbath-school is well organized, and is growing.

The services of the quarterly meeting commenced on Saturday of last week. Rev. O. Fisher, Presiding Elder, and Rev. J. C. Kolbe, were present, and preached with power, acceptability and success. The services continued nightly until Wednesday evening. Our prospects have steadily brightened for several months, and though there remains much to be done before we shall have attained all we desire and are working for, a spirit of confidence and courage and a disposition to co-operate in the work, prevades all the Church, from which we draw the strongest angurirs of success. We do not overrate nor strength, for we are yet feeble; we do not underrate the difficulties before us, for we know they are formidable. Still we are confident, for we cannot doubt that God is with us. The work ought to be done; we are trying to do it; God will give success.

A LEADEN PREACHER.

The Rev. Nicholas Murray says: "The effectiveness of preaching is far more dependent on the manner than what is generally admitted. The Rev.——was a man of good education, of good sense, of sincere piety; but he was made of lead. He was always late in the pulpit, and then waited for the people to collect. He always read, and if he made any mistake he would go back and correct it. He was never known to perpetrate a figure of speech or a gesture. He could preach on Christ's death for sinners with as little emotion as on the being of God. No matter what was his theme, his feelings never rose above the freezing point. He was known at the funeral of a child partly to read a sermon from the top of a pile of hats, built up for the occasion; in the midst of the reading the pile fell, and the sermon fell with them, and the service was brought suddenly to a close. In a few years most of his people withdrew to another congregation, and were pleased with the ministry of a man, ten of whose sermons would not contain as much sense as that sermon which fell with the pile of hats, and from whose fall the good man never recovered.

KOSSUTH'S POSITION.

Kossuth, in a note in the London Times, correcting misrepresentation, says:

"The purport of my argument is this: If England abstains from taking a part in this war, the war will remain restricted to the Austrian dominions and to the Italian peninsula. If, on the contrary, England interferes, the war will become a general European one, because Germany will not plunge into the war if told that she will not be supported by England; and in this case Russia, too, will remain neutral; but if England should either directly support Austria, or assist Germany in supporting her, then Russia, too, will step in, but on the opposite side—she will support France. So that if the present war assumes general European proportions, it will be entirely the work of England's intervention.

The Brookhaven Female College is likely to be an "institution." Rev. Mr. Whitworth, who built the new church at Brookhaven, is a "solid man," and intends to have a college as well as a church. Rev. H. J. Harris, of the Mississippi Conference, is widely and favorably known: And Rev. John P. Lee is an experienced and excellent teacher. They are all concerned, and we heartily wish them success.

The Mobile Postoffice is certainly "out of joint." We have had more trouble with it, than all the other postoffices within our circulation. Several instances have occurred where subscribers have complained that they did not get the Advocate for months, when it had been stopped by order of the postmaster, as "uncalled for."

The Scientific American is pre-eminently the leading journal of its class in the United States. All persons interested (and who is not?) in the most reliable current information in art, science, mechanics, agriculture, chemistry, and manufactures, should subscribe for it. Price $2.00 a year. Address Munn & Co., New York.

In our Advertising Columns will be found Harper & Bro's. advertisement of the next number of their magazine. We have ever thought it contains the most interesting general reading in the country. Price but three dollars per year. Judging from its selections we think the forthcoming number the best yet issued.

The London Gazette of May 31, announces the appointment of Henry Walter Ovenden, hitherto British Consul at Maranham, in Brazil, to the British Consulate at Baltimore, vacant by the death of Mr. Morton Dyer.

Attention is called to the advertisement of Mount Hermon Institute; also, that of Rev. G. G. Suxe, On General Educational Agency.

Several selections on the outside, from the Nashville Advocate, got in without credit, by an oversight.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Florida Colored Mission.—Rev. JOHN WILLIAMSON, sends his third Quarterly report. This mission may be said to be in a healthy condition, if not prosperous, having received into the Church during the present quarter of this Conference year forty-eight members. And where I have the co-operation of the preachers or their overseers there is a marked, decided, improvement in the moral and spiritual condition of the colored people on the plantations.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Rev. C. G. Young Writes from Homer La.:

"I find the high-land parishes healthy, and crops good, but the Church is in rather a cold state. The College building at this place is being roofed. It will be a handsome and commodious edifice, and if the building has progressed slowly, the foundation is laid on the rock he found the more secure; and so it will be with the institution itself. I have no doubt of its ultimate complete success.

Warlike Preparations in the British Colonies

A dispatch has been received at St. Johns, New Foundland, recommanding the ordering to England of the Lieut. Governor of the Island, Col. Law, who is commander of the forces, his services being necessary on the island. The troops on the station are to be considerably augmented, and the forts fortified with heavier metal. England while professing her neutrality, seems to be getting ready at all points, for war, as if she had no faith in the moderation of the French Emperor.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Arrival of the Kangaroo.—With Dates to 9th June.

Napoleon Entered Milan in Triumph—Austrians Evacuated Parma—Commercial Intelligence.

NEW YORK, June 21.—The royal mail steamship Kangaroo has arrived.

She brings full telegraphic advices from Liverpool and all parts of Europe up to the hour of her sailing.

LONDON, June 9.—The Atlantic Telegraph Company have had a meeting and accepted the offer of the British Government, consisting of a guarantee of the capital stock and a large amount of despatches. The company are determined to raise the necessary capital at once.

From the Seat of War.

LONDON, June 9.—Intelligence has been received at Paris to reflect that after the battle of Magenta, the Allied armies marched towards Milan.

The inhabitants having pronounced in favor of the King of Sardinia, the Emperor Napoleon and Victor Emanuel entered the city, and were received with the greatest enthusiasm.

The Austrians have evacuated the important fortress of Pavia, twenty miles south of Milan, and at the confluence of the Ticino and the Po.

Arrival of the Persia.—Dates to the 12th inst.

LONDON, June 11.—After the debate on the motion by the opposition expressing a want of Confidence in the Government a division took place, when the Ministry was defeated by a majority of thirteen.

It was expected that the Ministry would resign; but they had done so as late as Saturday.

The House of Commons had adjourned until the Friday following.

PARIS, June 8.—An official bulletin from the headquarters of the allied armies announces that a part of Upper Lombardy had freed themselves from the Austrians and had proclaimed Victor Emanuel King.

PARIS, June 8.—While retreating from Magenta the Austrians were pursued by the Allies, and when at Melegnano an engagement took place, during which the Austrians lost 1,500 killed and 1,200 were made prisoners.

The battle lasted nine hours, when both armies ceased operations.

At the latest accounts they were preparing for a general engagement.

The Government of the King of Sardinia has been established at Como and Londovico.

PARIS, June 11.—The Emperor has ordered the nomination of an Ambassador to the Court of Naples.

At Naples a modification of the Ministry had taken place.

Naples has made an official declaration of neutrality, and an order has been issued for the enrollment of 2500 men for the Neapolitan navy.

Movements of the Channel Fleet.

LONDON, June 11.—The channel fleet will anchor off Spithead shortly.

The Prussian Movements.

The army of Prussia is mobilized, and it is reported that Russia is soon to take part in the conflict.

After the engagement at the Melegnano, the Austriaos retreated to Lodi on the Adda river (the Bridge of Lodi), and all stationed themselves.

The Allies were advancing upon that point, where a battle will doubtless take place.

ROME, June 11.—There is still 500 Austrians garrisoned at Ferrara.

A detachment of Garibaldi's corps sailed along the shores of the Maggiore, disarming Austrian customhouse-guards and carrying off public treasurers.

An Austrian steamer in the Adriatic captured the French ship Raoul, bound from Cuba to Trieste.

PARIS, June 11.—The latest despatches from Magenta state that Marshal Canrobert is not dead or wounded.

LONDON, June 11.—Pending the last Parliamentary debates, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reviewing the financial condition of the country, gave it to be understood that measures of the gravest character were in preparation. The statement of the opposition in both Houses, is, that it will require £7,000,000 to bring the measure up to the present rate of expenditure.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that two of the most influential powers of Europe—alluding to England and Prussia—alarmed by the continued reverses of Austria, are making strenuous efforts towards a pacific settlement. Nothing is transpired as to the nature of the conditions to be submitted to the belligerent parties.

Movements in Prussia, Bavaria and Saxony.

DRESDEN, June 10th.—Commissioners from Berlin have arrived here for the purpose of negociating with the Boards of the State Railways for the transit of considerable bodies of Prussian troops. The same commissioners will leave for Munich, in order to conclude similar arrangements with the Government of Bavaria.

Camp of Chalons.

PARIS, June 11.—Gen. Schramm has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Camp of Chalons, where three divisions of cavalry are assembling.

The ladies of France, under the direction of the Empress Eugenie, have formed associations for making lint for the wounded of the Allies.

The Hiallic Telegraph.

LONDON, June 11.—The new Atlantic Telegraph Company has issued shares of £5 each to the amount of £600,000, the holders of which are guaranteed to enjoy a preferential dividend of 8 per cent.

The Red Sea Cable.

In consequence of the successful laying of the Red Sea Cable, transactions between Asia and Europe will be greatly accelerated. Despatches from India and China will hereafter be anticipated a week.

Arrival of Austrian Prisoners.

PARIS, June 11.—Five thousand Austrian prisoners have arrived at Marseilles and Toulon.

Garibaldi at Bergamo.

TURIN, June 10.—A bulletin announces that Garibaldi had encountered an Austrian corps from Brescia 1500 strong. After a desperate fight he drove them back, and occupies at present the considerable town of Bergamo.

LONDON, June 11.—An official Austrian bulletin from Verona, via Vienna, states the Austrian army has withdrawn beyond the Adda, in excellent order, and are continually receiving strong reinforcements from the reserve corps. The army, far from feeling discouraged at the result of Magenta and Melegnano, enjoy excellent spirits, and are longing for a decisive battle.

Private letters from Milan say that 500 Zouaves were put hors de combat, at the battle of Magenta. They also state that the Austrian forces consisted only of 30,000 men, of which 1500 were killed and 1200 taken prisoners. That at 11 o'clock at night a battalion of Hungarians and Croats, in endeavoring to surprise the village, were surrounded and defeated.

Consternation at Vienna.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times, says that the announcement of the battle of Magenta stunned the whole population at the capital. Old Soldiers are indignant that the finest army Austria ever possessed should have been entrusted to such a bungler as Gyulai!—Associated Press.

Arrival of steamer Bremen—with Dates to 9th June.

Resignation of the British Ministry—Austrians Evacuating the Papal States and other important positions—Blowing up of Fortifications—Death of Prince Metternich—Decline in Consols—Cotton Unchanged.

NEW YORK, June 26.—The steamship Bremen arrived this evening.

She left Bremen on Saturday, the 11th, and touched at Southampton on Monday, the 13th. She brings two days later news from London, Liverpool and the seat of war, than we previously had by the Persia.

Commercial Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, June 13.—The sales of cotton to-day (Monday) are estimated at 8,000 bales. The market closed very dull, but generally steady at the quotations by the Persia. The market is slightly in favor of buyers. Middling Orleans 6 13-16; Middling Mobile 6 11-16.

LONDON, June 13.—The funds are much depressed, owing in part to the resignation of the Derby Ministry.

Consols have declined ¼ since the sailing of the Persia. Consols for money closed at 93¼ to 93¾.

Change in the British Ministry.

LONDON, June 13.—In consequence of the opposition majority in the House of Commons on the vote of want of confidence, the Derby Ministry have handed in their resignation to the Queen, and requested her to select new advisers.

The Queen summoned Lord Palmerston, as the leader of the Opposition, to form a new Cabinet.

A new Cabinet has been formed, with Lord Palmerston as Premier and Lord John Russell as Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

Latest from the Seat of War.

LONDON, June 13.—The latest advices from the seat of war indicate that the Austrians are retiring from all their positions in the south, towards the strongly fortified positions behind the rivers Po and the Adige.

Dispatches from Turin announce that the Austrians have evacuated the important position of Piacenza, on the Po, in Parma—an equally important position of Padua, near Venice. They have also evacuated Lodi on the Adda, below Milan, and Cologna, near Legnago.

The Austrian garrison at Ancona, the most important place on the Adriatic in the Papal States, has been withdrawn towards the south.

Before leaving the fortress of Piacenza, the Austrians blew up the citadel and the fortifications.

Death of Metternich.

A dispatch from Vienna announces the death of Prince Metternich, who, during nearly half a century, was Prime Minister of Austria.

LONDON, June 13.—Despatches from the seat of war confirm the reports of a general retreat of the Austrian army.

The Austrian headquarters have, it is reported, been removed to the great fortress of Mantua.

England.

The London Times says that the new Foreign Minister, Lord John Russel, is an ardent friend of Italy, and that he and Lord Palmerston wants Austria to admit her defeat and her ascertained inferiority in coping with the Allies, as also the inevitable disadvantages of her position south of the Alps.

The Times says that both Lords Palmerston and Russel believe that Austria would consult her own greatness by relinquishing the territory which costs great armies and greater sodium to maintain.

The War in Italy.

It is rumored that the Emperor Napoleon will soon return to France, and that Marshall Pellisier will assume the command-in-chief of the army of Italy.

The Austrians evacuated Piacenza so hastily as to be unable to take away with them their provisions and munitions of war. Many of their heavy guns were also left behind in their hasty retreat. The Austrians also evacuated Bologna on the 11th, and marched for Modena.

The French troops have passed the river Adda without striking a blow, and are closely following up the retreating Austrians.

The Austrian troops have evacuated all the States of the Church, including Ferrara.

The Emperor of Austria, it is reported, is to take the command of the army in person: his plan being to act on the defensive.

The Austrian loss at the two engagements at Palestra is officially stated to have been 15 officers and 513 men killed; 1 General, 23 officers and 878 men wounded; with 6 officers and 774 men missing.

Gen. Garibaldi had occupied Bergamo, and had repulsed 1500 Austrians who were marching against him from Brescia.

Garibaldi's corps also threatened the southern portion of the Tyrol, from the direction of Valcamonica, Val Trompa and Bagolina.

The French Adriatic fleet has received powerful reinforcements, and it is reported that the French intend shortly to land a strong body of troops between Venice and Trieste.

Later from Mexico.

QUARANTINE, June 26.—The steamship Tennessee arrived at this place this evening, bringing advices from Vera Cruz to the 22nd instant.

The purser reports that a conducta left the city of Mexico on the 28th of May, with $5,000,000 in specie, for Vera Cruz.

The treasure was seized on its way, when within about forty miles from Vera Cruz, by the troops under General Robles. Commissioners was sent from Vera Cruz to negotiate with Robles for its surrender, but they were unable to accomplish anything.

It is stated that the money is to be shipped, by order of the French and English Ministers, at Mocambo, on board a British war vessel.

The American Minister, McLane, has sent Capt. Farregut, the commander of the United States steam sloop-of-war Brooklyn, to demand from Gen. Robles the release of that portion of the treasure which belongs to American citizens, amounting to $2,000,000. The result of Captain Farregut's mission had not transpired when the Tennessee left Vera Cruz.

The English fleet lying off Sacrificios, had been ordered up to Vera Cruz.

Later from Panama and South America.

Ship Destroyed by an Iceberg—War between Salvador and Honduras—Central American Affairs—Important from Nicaragua.

NEW YORK, June 27.—The steamship Moses Taylor has arrived at this port, bringing dates from Aspinwall and the 18th inst. from Panama to the 19th inst., and $2,400,000 in treasure from California.

The United States vessels of war Roanoke and St. Louis were at Aspinwall, and the Vandalia and St. Mary's were at Panama. Lieut. Lambert, of the United States Navy, died on board the Cyane on the 27th of May.

Advices from Valparaiso of the 28th ult. represent that the revolution had been entirely suppressed.

The ship Indian Queen, from Melbourne to Liverpool, struck an iceberg on 1st of April and was abandoned at sea. She had forty-one passengers on board. The captain and first mate, with thirteen passengers, got into the lifeboat, but drifted away, and have not been heard from. The remainder of the passengers and crew arrived at Valparaiso on the 14th of May.

War seems inevitable between San Salvador and Honduras.

The Nicaraguan Government, in answering the dispatches sent by Secretary Cass to our Minister, General Lamar, says that, as a sovereign power, she claims the right to accept or reject any treaty proposed by other powers.

She claims the return of the Mosquito Kingdom, and refuses to acknowledge the King.

She justifies her seizure of the steamers of the Transit Company, in Nicaragua.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, June 27, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price Current, ending on the 25th inst.:

The past week has been a period of very little animation in the market generally, and we are without any important changes to notice. Our leading staple, Cotton, has been subjected to the disadvantages of rather unfavorable European advices, and nothing of much importance has been done in the article, though prices have been quite well maintained on a low stock. In Tobacco, Sugar and Molasses, and the various articles of Western Produce, the transactions have also been limited, with prices, in most cases, in favor of buyers.

On Saturday European advices, four days later, were received by the Anglo-Saxon, reporting a dull Cotton market at Liverpool, the sales for three days having been confined to 17,000 bales, at a decline of ⅛d.—Middling Orleans being quoted at 6¾d. The advices from Manchester were unfavorable; Consols had improved. On Wednesday three days later advices were before the public, by the steamers Kangaroo and Persia, from Liverpool. They report a dull and declining Cotton market at Liverpool, the sales of the week ended on the 10th instant, were 38,000 bales—the decline of the week being 1-16 to ⅛d.—the greatest reduction being in the lower grades, which were very difficult of sale. The quotations for Orleans Fair, 6¾, and Middling, 6 13-16d. These figures, compared with those brought by the previous weekly steamer, would indicate a decline of 1-16d. in Middling, but an advance of ⅛d. on Fair, the quotations by the European having been 6d. for Fair Orleans, and 6⅞d. for Middling. The Manchester accounts are favorable, the market being steadier and firmer. At Havre, the week's sales were 8000 bales—leaving a stock of 100,000 bales, and the market closed dull at 106 francs for tres ordinaire, and for bas 106f.

COTTON.—Our last report closed upon an unsettled market, as rumors prevailed that later and still more unfavorable European advices had been received, which, however, proved unfounded. On Saturday advices were received, reporting a dull market at Liverpool, and a decline of about ⅛d. In our own market there was scarcely any movement, only a few small lots being sold, barely amounting to some 500 bales. On Monday about 1000 bales were taken, on Tuesday 500, with a similar amount on Wednesday, on which day the Persia's advices, of a similar tenor to those of the Anglo Saxon were before the public. On Thursday the sales were some 700 bales, and on Friday nearly 100 bales were disposed of; making a total for the week of 3,300 bales. Total receipts of the week 1800, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,611,331 bales, against 1,558,211 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 7241 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 24th inst. 71,353 bales. It will thus be seen that we are reduced to a very limited business, the stock being light and but few buyers remaining. The assortment, also, is not adapted to even the limited demand which exists, the enquiry being mostly for Low Middling to Strict Middling, while nearly the whole stock remaining would be below or above these grades. With respect to prices, we have no marked change to notice, the few sales making being at about the range of last week's figures, which are continued.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	6 @ 7	Good Middling	12 @12¼
Ordinary	8 @ 9	Middling Fair	12¾@ —
Good Ordinary	9¼@10¼	Fair	— @ —
Low Middling	10¾@10¾	Good Fair	— @ —
Middling	11¼@11¾	Good and Fine	— @ —

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 1,500 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 3¾ to 4¼; Common to Good Common 4¼ to 5; Fair to Fully Fair 5¼ to 5¾; Prime to Choice 6 to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified 6¼ to 8; Refined 8¾ to 9¼ cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 2,000 bbls. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 27 to 30; Prime to Choice 31 to 33 in bbls. and in half-bbls. 32 to 35 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs—factory, — to —; planters' 3 to 4¼; Leaf—Inferior to common 4¼ to 5¾; fair 5¾ to 6¾; fine 7 to 7¾; choice, heavy and light, 8 to 11 cents per pound. The sales were confined to about 1000 hhds. We do not observe any quotable change in prices, though with a reduced demand and an accumulating stock the advantage is on the side of purchasers.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 6000 bbls. at a range of $4 75 to $5 50 for naburanded, $6 00 to $6 25 for superfine, and $7 00 to $7 50, and $8 to $9 25 per bbl. for extra and choice extra brands; 20 bbls Memphis City Mills, made from new wheat, the first arrival of the season, at $9 00 per bbl.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 22,000 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from $1 to $1 05 for ordinary to good mixed, $1 07½ to $1 10 for yellow, and $1 15 to $1 20 per bushel for mixed and white. Oats sell at 55 to 60 cents per bushel for St. Louis and Northern. Bran is quoted at 87½ to 92½c. per 100 lbs. Wheat.—No transactions known.

PORK.—The sales for the past week were about 4000 bbls.—ranging at $16 50 to $16 75 per barrel for Mess; $14 O. $15 75; Prime, $13 to $13 50.

BEEF.—We quote Prime Mess at $15 to $17 per bbl. as the range for good to the best brands for Family Mess. No sales—prices nominal.

BACON.—Shoulders 6¾ to 7; Bilbed Sides 9 to 9¼; Clear Sides 10½ to 11; Sugar-cured Hams 11 to 12 cents per pound.

LARD.—In barrels, and tierces 11¾ to 11¾; kegs, 12¾ to 13 cents per pound.

BUTTER.—Western generally selling at 12½ to 16 cents per pound, for new.

BAGGING AND BALE ROPE.—We quote Kentucky Bagging at 12½ to 13 cents per yard; India Bagging, 12½ to 13c. Bale Rope, hand spun, 6¾ to 7¾, and machine made, 8 to 8¼ cents per pound.

GUNNY BAGS.—Limited parcels sell at 11¼ cents for light and 12¼ to 13c. for heavy and extra heavy bags.

COFFEE.—We quote fair at 10¾ to 10¾, good fair 11 to 11¾, prime 11¾ cents per pound.

To carry out fully the spirit and law of the last General Conference in reference to the sale and circulation of Books, and to accommodate as far as possible all our customers, we have carefully revised our Catalogue, and modified the prices of our publications. Our new Catalogue will be issued at no distant day. In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers all books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicated.

Letter from the Log-Cabin.

Bayou Bartholomew, Arkansas.

MR. EDITOR: The beautiful month of May, with its wealth of flowers and ripening berries is numbered with the things that were; but the memories of the pleasant month will long beautify the hearts of many of your readers. We are the happier for enjoying God's blessings: the many lovely external objects around and above us, were given to make us better, that we might through them be led to repentance. It is an enigma to me, how so many of "fortune's favorites" can pass unheeded the various beautiful objects that surround their daily paths. God has given us all a heart-home in which to cherish all sweet memories and pleasant scenes, and sadly bitter ones too, if we so will it. In looking in on my own heart, I find many pictures of beauty, as well as many that memory would gladly banish. With what care then should we watch these heart-homes of ours—that none but pictures of beauty shall grace their mystic walls.

But I have moralized long enough, and will proceed to give you a description of a picture which at present occupies a conspicuous place in the well-filled gallery of this heart-home of mine. If my specimen number pleases you, I may describe to you other reminiscences, treasured on memory's page.

The date of the picture is the 20th May, 1859; the place, Jones' Chapel, Morehouse Parish, Louisiana. In the foreground, are grand old oaks that extend far out their sturdy arms, casting long protecting shadows over the heads of a merry throng of children. Standing a little back in the chapel, the architecture and proportions of which I leave for the exercise of your imagination, after assuring you that it is neither of the Grecian, Gothic, nor Log-cabin style; suffice it to say, that inside and around the chapel are congregated the juveniles, as well as the elite of the neighborhood.

The profusion of flowers, bright eyes, smiling faces, white dresses, and blue and pink ribbons, denote that some merry, innocent amusement, is the topic of the day.

A number of Louisiana and Arkansas children, pupils of Rev. Dr. Brewer's School, are enjoying a May Festival, and are about crowning two of their companions—Miss L. Robinson, "Queen of Flowers," and Master C. Tatum, "King of the Green Woods."

'Tis a lovely scene! The procession of smiling children in white dresses and wreaths of flowers, the blue sky and bright sunshine, the luxuriant trees and pleasant shade. There is not a more lovely sight on this beautiful earth of ours, than groups of happy children—those human buds and blossoms—scattered here and there under the rich foliage of our primeval forests. It gladdens my heart to have good, obedient children about me—they are the "sunbeams" of our country homes—without them, we would be cheerless indeed.

"O, blessed things are children!
The gifts of heavenly love!
They stand betwixt our worldly hearts
And better things above;
They link us with the spirit world
By purity and truth,
And keep our hearts still fresh and young,
With the presence of their youth."

ORDER OF PROCESSION:

A "body-guard" of eight manly little soldiers leads the van, "with ramrods bright and painted barrels too," while the portly captain, his plumed hat jauntily set on his head, gives the word of command with a dignified tone that would do credit to an older officer. The King and Queen—followed by four maids of honor, personating the seasons—and then the long cortege of courtiers—fair and gentle lads and lasses, wreathed with flowers. The gay procession circles the open plat before the door, and then flies into the spacious chapel—where the audience is collected.

THE CORONATION AND CEREMONIES:

The King and Queen being seated under a canopy of green leaves, the First Maid of Honor, Spring, (Miss Mattie Jones) very gracefully crowns "Her Majesty" with a wreath of evergreens and roses, repeating the following verses.

"The cold, gloomy Winter has passed away,
And we joyfully welcome this bright May-day,
We have culled the loveliest flowers of earth,
And in friendship here come, with joy and mirth,
To twine thee a wreath of garlands, gay—
And crown thee the Queen of the festal day.

We crown thee the Queen of the festal hour,
And cheerfully yielding, acknowledge thy power;
We greet thee, the Queen of the day and of song,
Rule merrily ever our joyous throng! [Kisses]
We salute thee, the Queen of this bright May-day!
Let the heart that is sad, be merry to-day."

Summer (Miss Ella Tiller) presents a beautiful sceptre, with the following address:

"While the wild flowers bloom and the forests are green,
'Tis said that the fairies do dance round their Queen,
In the magical circle they joyfully move,
For the Queen they obey, wields a sceptre of love.
Such a sceptre is thine; O Queen of our choice!
In the love of thy subjects we bid thee rejoice,
This symbol of power we present unto thee,
'Tis the sceptre of Love—rule the brave and the free!"

Miss J. Duckworth (personating Autumn) brings her offering of flowers, and says:

"Oh, bright and fair are the flowers of Spring,
As the fading dreams of youth!
Though many they have voices and messages bring,
Of love, of friendship and truth.
These flowers we bring thee, will soon fade away—
But the virtues they 'token shall never decay.
May thy pathway through life be strewn with flowers,
And care leave no trace on thy brow!
May thy fairies be spent amid nature's green bowers,
With the loved, that are around thee now.
Accept them these flowers, and let them be
The token's of friendship we cherish for thee!"

Winter (Miss C. Wilson) gives a kiss, with the following poetical tribute:

"Gentle Queen! on this day,
When the blithesome and gay,
And the friends that we love are meeting,
I can bring thee no flowers,
Ne'r crown, or its powers,
But I give an affectionate greeting.

May the crown which you wear,
And the flowers you bear
Never wither or yield to decay;
But long may you reign,
Of all hearts the Queen—
As lovely as now, Queen of May."

To which the Queen replies—

"To friends, who brought me this flowery crown,
I cherish your love as a treasure,
More precious by far than the sceptre or throne
Or authority's shadowy pleasure.

Ye have crowned me the Queen of your gay, happy band,
And your truth ye have symbolled with flowers;
In your innocent joys we will join heart and hand,
While we sport amid nature's green bowers.

And now, while the festal horn bids to the feast,
Let us hasten to share in its pleasures!
Let the tables be spread with affection and peace
And the pure wine of joy without measure.

[Presents the King.]

And now, for companions, I present you your King,
Our consort most royal, and King by your choice;
I pray your affections around him may cling,
And hope, in our reign, your hearts may rejoice."

Minister of State (Master T. Williams) crowns the "King of the Green Woods."

Most Gracious Sovereign: By the united suffrages of your subjects, you have been chosen King of the festal day. In accordance with their expressed desire, I, as their representative, present you these symbols of authority, (presents crown and sceptre) and request you to cherish them as the offering of loyal and sincere hearts; and pray that, for the future, your heart and theirs, may, like this garland, ever entwine in one coronal of love and esteem.

As the oak, is the monarch of the woods and an emblem of the Diety, let it remind you that piety should crown the Monarch's heart as its leaves crown your head; and may the wisdom betokened by the bay be thine; and may your reign be characterized by that love which the rose and pink remind us of. Long may you live, and may the hand of God direct you!

[All exclaim—Long live the King and Queen.]

Capt. Wilson marshals his gallant band, and offers himself and troops.

Most gracious Sovereign:

"We offer our hand as as a body-guard,
To protect you from open or ambushed foe!
Though our cheeks are fair, and our hands not hard,
Yet our hearts are trusty and brave we trow!
Then fear not to cherish our youthful band,
The fearless in heart and the strong in hand;
But not with gun or sword. Where love's the chain,
That binds in friendship, heart to heart again;
Of implements of steel, no need have we,
To guard our persons or to rule the free;
Enough, to know "our country needs our aid,"
Our men are armed, our armies ready made;
Each sprigs, obedient to his sovereign's call,
Resolved with him to stand, with him to fall.
Free, then, your band, and mingle with the gay,
In yonder happy band where pleasure rules the day."

The Captain disbands his men, and the hum of pleasurable excitement falls pleasantly on the ear. After a short intermission the children collect under the oaks, where is spread a bountiful collation. The repast being over we again assembled in the Chapel, and listened for an hour to the youthful orators. "Charles Chatterbox" rattles away with a volubility that carries everything before it. Admiral Crawley with true sailor-like frankness, tells us that "Nell shall be the wife of the sailor-boy, some day." The fairy-like little "Alices" speak with a sweet childish grace; but I must desist for want of time and paper to describe more fully the pleasant picture that occupies so large a niche in my heart-home.

CONCLUSION.

The children are dismissed for a play in the woods, and the gentlemen convene a meeting to prepare for the celebration of the fourth of July. After appointing an Orator for the "Day," and a Reader of the Declaration of Independence, with other preliminaries, we adjourn, well pleased with ourselves, "all the world, and the rest of mankind."

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

BIBLE EXAMPLES OF DOMESTIC WORSHIP.

The patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, whenever, in their pilgrimages, they fixed on a place of residence, erected an alter to God for family devotion, and called on the name of the Lord.

Joshua resolved that, as for him and his family, they would serve the Lord, that is, worship him.

Job practiced family worship. "He sent and sanctified his children, and rose early in the morning and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all. Thus did Job continually."

David, having spent one day in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the place he had prepared for it, and in presenting peace-offerings before the Lord, returned at night to bless his household, that is to pray for blessings upon his family, or to attend upon family devotion.

Cornelius, the centurion, it is said, "feared God with all his house" meaning, worshipped Him with his family.

In the Lord's prayer, we have a command for family devotion. "After this manner, therefore, pray ye: Our Father who art in heaven." The form of prayer plural. It must, therefore, mean social prayer, and if social, then family prayer, for a family is the most proper society to engage in this devotion.

Paul in his epistle to the Colossians, having pointed out the duties of husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, adds, "Continue in prayer, watch in the same with thanksgiving." The subject upon which he was speaking, leads us to conclude he meant family prayer.

In his epistle to the Ephesians, he enjoins it as a duty to "pray always with all prayer," that is, to offer prayer of every kind, and in every form, and at every proper season. Family prayer, must therefore be included in this injunction.

The Apostle Peter exhorts husbands and wifes to live together in the discharge of the duties of conjugal affection and Christian obedience.

THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION.

Hens crowing! The Woman's Rights Convention was held in Mozart Hall, on Broadway, on a week night. Allowable time, respectable place, strange thing; so we went to see. Paying a dime at the door, we were ushered into a large audience-room, where a crowd was not merely pressed but, as cotton men say, compressed. At the farther end was a platform occupied by—females. This social phenomenon had drawn out a sprinkling of philosophers, as well as others. There was the Rev. Dr. ——, and family; yonder, a company of white cravats, and close by, Bishop ——, not to mention an Hon., here and there, who are as plentiful as Georgia Majors. Every respectable-looking man that came in, cast his eyes round, with a look that plainly said, "Is there any other respectable man here besides myself?"

Lucretia Mott, a small Quakeress, was speaking in a scolding tone. Then followed Antoinette Brown Blackwell, to whose name the papers put Rev., for she once undertook the pastorship of a church. Dress close fitting; arms long, and thrown about promiscuously; figure slender, and of medium height. Then Miss Rose, of Dutch extraction and abundant auburn curls, shaking mightily. Strong minded woman! Scores of times has the reader heard a sister in lovefeast, whose fame extended not beyond the neighborhood, excel any one of them in every element of speechmaking. When woman within sacred circles talk of the love of Jesus, and shed tears in talking; talks of the inner life, its conflicts and joys, and of the future hope; or, Miriam-like, sings high praises to God in the congregation, then we listen, and feel, and assent: but this jawing about rights, and contending to be heard before rude crowds, was harsh in sound, and in sight ineffably disgusting. We left while Miss Rose was shaking her ambrosial curls.

One passage, and one only, was spirited. The crowd weary of the wailing inanities of Lucretia, and Antoinette and Rose, (picked orators,) cried out for Lucy Stone, Beecher, Greeley, Phillips and other favorites. Whereupon the Presidentess, a middle-aged, firm lady, wearing spectacles, and a snuff-user, stepped forward, with fan clenched in her hand, and in loud distinct voice, said, "If the audience please: we have a programme of our own, and you will allow us in the order of speakers, to consult our wishes." Down came the house. Mozart Hall came down at that.

Is that of a Yankee, who, in an Italian city, stopped a religious procession in order to light his cigar from one of the holy candles.

Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. NANCY MOODY, died in Hancock county, Miss., on May 29th, 1859, in her 82d year. She was born in Marion District, South Carolina; moved to Mississippi while it was yet a new country, with a large family and few means of support, which subjected them to many privations; but, by close management, herself and her husband raised a large family of twelve children, and lived to see them grown and married, save one, and settled off. She, with her husband, united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1820, under the ministry of Rev. James Applewhite. She lived a consistent member until death, I had the painful pleasure to be with her the week before she died. She was suffering much, yet conquered and resigned. I asked her in regard to her confidence in Christ. She replied promptly, "All is well." She was ready to live or to die—but, rather inclined "to depart and be with Christ, which she felt would be far better." Thus lived, an affectionate wife, a kind mother and a benevolent neighbor. "Our loss is her gain." "Thou art gone to the grave, but we will deplore thee. Whose God was thy ransomer, thy guardian and guide. He gave thee, he took thee; and he will restore thee; and death has no sting, for the Savior has died."

T. MOODY.

Allenton Alabama, June 15th, 1859.

REESE TAYLOR, died in Mobile, 25th of May, in the fortieth year of his age. He was a native of Virginia, but had for years been a resident of this city. As a man of business, he was punctual, diligent and scrupulously correct; in his general intercourse with the world, he was courteous and manly; charity and forbearance were conspicuous in his life and conversation; in the holy relation of husband and father, he was a true hearted man, forgetful of himself, and ever ready to alleviate the sorrows and augment the happiness of those whom God had committed to his care; as a Christian, he was earnest, unobtrusive and sincere. His heart was fixed; his liberality was equal to his means; his faith was steady and clear as a fixed star, and his peace flowed like a river. Two days before his death, consumption had reduced him so low that he was hardly able to speak above a whisper. In that condition, he overheard a friend asking his wife the state of his mind, and he replied, "I shall soon see God for myself," his countenance bright with the holy joy that filled his heart. Never has the writer seen a Christian more fully ripe for the kingdom of heaven.

Mobile, June 12th, 1859. A. S. ANDREWS.

JOHN S. CHILDERS, died at Pleasant Hill, Desoto Parish, Louisiana, in the sixty-first year of his age. He was born in Washington county, Georgia; and for many years was a citizen of Macon, where some twenty years since, he obtained peace by faith in Jesus Christ, and immediately joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was a zealous and devoted member; served it as steward for many years. He lived in Summerfield, Alabama, some two years, and for the last eight years has lived at this place. He was a man of active habits, energetic and persevering in business; accumulated wealth, and often lamented that he was so engrossed with business that his religious enjoyments were not as great as he desired. But he never failed to attend and bear his part in the social meetings of the Church prayer and class meetings. He gave to his wife and other friends at different times, the clearest and most satisfactory evidence of his preparation "to depart and to be with Christ." Jordan's angry waves were calmed, and to die was only to realign, and fall asleep in the arms of Jesus. J. PIPES.

WILLIAM MACPHERSON was born in North Carolina, May 9th, 1777, where he lived until the year 1836, when he moved to Tuscaloosa county, Ala., lived there until 1846, then removed to Wayne Co., Miss., where he lived until death removed him to his home in heaven, Sunday, May 15th, 1859, aged eighty-two years. In the year 1813, while a resident of Tuscaloosa county, he attended a camp-meeting in that county, under the charge of the Rev. Charles McLeod, at which he professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, in which he lived a faithful member up to the time of his death. During the last four years of his life he was deprived of Church privileges, through the infirmities of old age, but this did not deprive him of the comforts of religion. Jesus was precious to his soul, even of home. In his last illness he expressed himself as having no fears whatever. His end was peaceful.

J. D. CAMERON.

June 20th, 1859.

ELIZABETH CAROLINE, wife of W. H. Prascor of Bossier Parish, Died April 27th, after a short illness, sister R. was a native of Tennessee, a member of the M. E. Church; and for twenty-three years a professor of religion, she was not afraid to die; nearly twenty-one years and a half, husband and wife were permitted to "tread the rough path of the world side by side," then, death came, broke up their companionship, and turned another happy home into a house of mourning. A babe unconscious of its loss is there, and eight children besides, who weep for a mother gone.

P. M. GOODWYN.

Minden, Louisiana May 31st, 1859.

JOHN WILLIAMS, was born in Sumpter District, South Carolina, Nov., 10th, 1805; and died near Brownsville, Hinds county, Mississippi, May 21st, 1859. Kindness and affection to his family and friends, firmness in defence of truth and morality, as well as his pious life, were traits of character generally conceded to him. He had lived a consistent Christian life in the M. E. Church for some thirty years. The evidence which he gave of his readiness to die was satisfactory and comforting to his many friends and relatives, who stood by his dying couch.

J. W. PHILLIPS.

WILLIAM H. H. BURROUGHS, oldest son of sister Eliza Burroughs, departed this life, in Polate Coupee Parish, June 12, 1859, in the twelfth year of his age. He was a dutiful son, a kind brother, and an agreeable associate. While we convoy his body to the lonely grave, there to rest quietly till aroused by the trump of God; his soul, which, has already been carried by angels into the presence of Jesus, will enjoy that sweet and happy rest, which is prepared for the people of God.

Atchafalaya, June 13th, 1859. J. F. WINN.

MARY ANN GATLIN, wife of Mr. C. Gatlin, died in Coffee county, Ala., April 14th, 1859. She was born March 18th, 1837; was married Oct, 7th, 1857; joined the M. E. Church, 1853; professed religion the same year; lived exemplary till Death. She was the daughter of George and Sarah Hamiel; was born in Pike county, Ala., 1842. Sister Gatlin enjoyed almost uninterrupted peace with God for several years before her death; but during her last sickness, God was pleased to reveal himself as an all sufficient Saviour. She spoke of death calmly and was enabled to shout "victory!". "All is well!" She exhorted her husband to cheer-up, and live for God: and they would soon meet again on the other shore.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and pareulage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worm, Sore Eyes, Scald Head; Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. Its can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc. etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhoea or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Chlorosis or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure what confirmed Scrotula. The following instance is interesting:

SCROFULA—A girl of 16 or 18 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved—long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Patent or, but when added to a Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVAY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Wild-cavo Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash" which I purchased of you, I differed with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I thick that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash obtances its value tenfold.

Very respectfully yours,
C. K. STEVENS

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of South Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co—As any testimonial in reference to your proprietions may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.

Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Commundicated,

ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that Wines's Canadian Vermifuge was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression on the child by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. To all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every instance one, (that of the eldest) the like happy results have been produced. These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my unitpathy heretofore in acetrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experience I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. B. VASSER.

H. T. HELMBOLD—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. I had ordered me immediately relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

LETTER FROM CÆSAR'S HEAD.

Greenville District, S. C.

My last was from Table Rock, which place we left on the following day. Bearing north, we came, in an hour's ride, to

"The vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet;"

Where the Slicking,

"Sparkling and bright in its liquid light,"

Mingles its waters with the Saluda. Fording the river just at the junction, I reined up my horse to take a last view of the Slicking—like a light-hearted maiden, this bright and beautiful river comes dancing down the mountain-side—then gliding gracefully and slowly along, as it moves through the bosom of the quiet valley, it gives its name and its wealth of crystal waters to the Saluda.

From thenceforth these twain are one—their countless drops unite, and blend in one clear and shining river.

As one, they flow onward together;
As one, they flow onward forever.

God hath joined them together, man may not put them asunder.

As you move onward, in the direction of Cæsar's Head, the country grows rapidly more wild and rugged. You are constantly mounting upward—moving steadily into a higher latitude and lighter atmosphere.

The Table Rock is, seemingly, hanging over you still; and, when at the distance of eight miles, you can hardly believe that it is more than a stone's throw from you.

A turnpike road, smooth but precipitous, leads you gradually up to the summit of Cæsar's Head. For half an hour your course is north, and then, to avoid some impassable cliff or huge pile of rock, the road is turned abruptly in the opposite direction; and, for the next half hour, you are traveling on a road running parallel with and directly above the way over which you passed an hour before; and the distance between the two points is perhaps not more than fifty feet. Should your hat fall from your head, it would drop into the road below—over which you had passed an hour before.

The view from Cæsar's Head is perhaps unsurpassed in the world. Mountains rise on mountains; hills tower above hills; valleys stretch out before you in an endless chain. A thousand farms are in view, in the distance seeming to be the most diminutive garden spots. The view is bounded only by the bending sky, which stoops to blend its colors with the soft blue of the mountain's summit.

Below, you trace the course of the Saluda, as it winds among the mountains and glides through the valleys; you hear the soft murmur of its waters as they go, dancing over rocks and pebbles just beneath you; and, far away it is spread out in a green valley as a quiet lake, and glitters like a broad sheet of silver in the sunlight.

On the summit of the mountain there are several cultivated fields—wheat, rye, oats, barley and Irish potatoes being the principal productions. The late frosts of Spring, and early frosts in Autumn, prevent the maturing of the corn generally—though an occasional crop is made.

On this, the highest point of the Blue Ridge there is a most excellent public-house. There can be no more delightful Summer retreat. Col. Hagood has neat and comfortable cottages—the fare is unsurpassed anywhere. And there are unusual attractions in these mountains for those who love a quiet life; and a total exemption would be found from the oppressive heat in midsummer.

One of the coldest springs known, is on Cæsar's Head. Place your hand in it for a moment, and you conclude that it must come gushing from an ice-house hard by.

Crowds of people—health and pleasure seekers—flock to Cæsar's Head during the summer months.

How much better for our "birds of passage,"—the thousands who fly northward every summer and shake their golden wings over abolition soil—how much better for them and for the South, if they would seek their summer homes amid the mountains of the Carolinas or Georgia. The scenery is unsurpassed in the world; the water is cold, sparkling and pure; the air is health-giving, and the temperature perfectly delightful.

Of medicinal waters, there can be found an endless variety. Mineral springs, of every kind and quality, abound all over South Carolina and Georgia. And then we are at home—we spend our money among our friends, instead of heaping it into the laps of those who denounce and vilify us; and who are constantly seeking to kindle incendiary fires that shall leave our houses desolate, and fill our land with lamentation, mourning and woe.

The State line was directly across Cæsar's Head. Going north-west in the direction of Hendersonville, you pass in to Jackson county, North Carolina. This was all once, "Buncombe." Yancy, and Jackson, and Henderson, were all framed out of Buncombe, and Buncombe still left. It was once known as the "State of Buncombe," not inappropriately so called, for some of the States of our confederacy are smaller than Old Buncombe used to be. Glorious old Buncombe! How much has been done by politicians of late years for Buncombe—"Making speeches for Buncombe," has passed into a Proverb. The origin of this saying was afloat in this way: The North Carolina Legislature was in session—the Representative from Buncombe was speaking, after discussing various questions of interest to the State at large, he felt that it was due his immediate constituency, that something should be said and done for them especially, and turning to the speaker he exclaimed energetically, "and now, Mr. Spenker, here goes for Buncombe!"

Thus originated, I believe, that now universally used phrase, "making speeches for old Buncombe."

Old North Carolina is a great State—all of North Carolina is not Buncombe, and Buncombe is not now all of North Carolina. She may not equal her sister, "Palmetto," in the production of fire-eaters and Nullifiers, but she can take the palm in tar, pitch and turpentine, not to mention "Tar River herrings" and Buncombe Cabbages.

The South Carolinians are very much inclined to tell stories on the Ilancomhcltes. But you may take my word for it, Mr. Editor, that South Carolina can "show" some as perfect specimens of live hoosiers, as exist. She has much wealth, refinement, and talent, but she has with North Carolina, a very fair proportion of ignorance and superstition. I remember a story of a South Carolina Representative, which I will relate. As it occurred many years ago, it may not be considered as a true picture of things there now, perhaps it is not. One thing is true, this representation is not the representation now. But the story:

One of the members from Pickens district, who was chosen more on account of his "strong natural abilities" than for showy talents, wore a pair of red brogan shoes, which became the source of much annoyance in the House, at the hotel, and even in the street. It was skreak, skreak, skreak—from morning till night. He could be heard at the distance of half a square away. Up stairs and down stairs, it was skreak, skreak, skreak—when the gentleman from Pickens had the floor, there was no use talking. Nothing could silence those heartless, though not sole-less brogans. In the House, "gag-law" might be successfully resorted to, in order to silence some noisy speakers; moving the previous question might "crush out" others, or a motion to adjourn might terminate a stormy session. But neither "gag-law," nor the "previous question," nor "adjournment," could silence the everlasting "skreak, skreak" of those musical russetts.

The "gentleman from Pickens," was in a dilemma—his feet had given him a notoriety, which perhaps his head could never have won for him. It was not such notoriety as his ambition led him to seek. He grew sick, not under, but above the ceaseless skreak, skreak, skreak, of that mountain leather. What should he do? What could he do? He could not afford to sacrifice his shoes to preserve the peace of the State. He could not come into the House bare-foot—this would lower his dignity—he occupied a high position at home, (he lived in the mountains) the "pay" would not justify the expense of a new pair minus the skreak. He resolved to consult a friend.

It was during an animated discussion in the House—the gentleman from Pickens was in his place—the person occupying the next seat to him was Col. Sloan of Anderson. Col. S. was deeply interested in a speech upon the Bill proposing to give aid to the Blue Ridge railroad. This was a pet subject with the Col., and he would not loose a word of what was said when that question was before the House. He leaned anxiously forward to catch every word. Suddenly the gentleman from Pickens leaned over towards him, and, in a very subdued voice, intended to be heard by Sloan only—"Sloan, Sloan, Sloan!" said he. But Sloan was not disposed to hear. At length he elevated his voice slightly, and spoke with more determination—"Sloan, SLOAN, SLOAN! I say, can't you hear?" "What do you want?" replied Sloan impatiently. Can you tell me what will take the skreak outen shoes? The Col. lost the balance of his rail-road speech; and the next day it was found that the gentleman from Pickens had lost the skreak from his shoes.

Pardon this digression. The gentleman from Pickens led me off the road. I was journeying in the direction of Hendersonville, North Carolina. From the Valley of the French Broad I may write again. I shall inflict but one more letter upon you. Since I left home Spring has past, and Summer with its thousand leafy tongues has come. With you the weather is intensely hot, but here it is delightfully cool. I try to fix it up that the Almanac is wrong, that Spring has not gone by—but the figures are against me. Though the leaves are here but partly grown, and only the early Spring flowers are opened, yet I know that at home,

"The corn-top is ripe and the meadows in the bloom,
And the birds make music all the day."

In a few days I hope to be there. VERY TRULY YOURS,

H. T. LEWIS.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

"THE PULPIT."

"Let no man glory in men."

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Lee is evidently in sympathy with a class of modern writers who have said much about "the preaching required for the times."

To define true gospel preaching is, to my mind, an impractical undertaking. If you ask me to point out gospel preachers—I begin at once, with Peter, Paul, Barnabas, Luther, Melanthon, Zuingle, Wesley, Nelson, Bramwell, Asbury, Benjamin Abbot, and John Easter.

These men preached, in their day and generation—and the slain of the Lord were many. I doubt if brother Lee would dare to unfrock one of them: and, it is not saying too much, to affirm that "the Lord "hath his quiver full of them." And when the Church prays the Lord of the harvest to send laborers—it means just such men as these.

With the history of the past, its failures and successes, as a grand panorama passing in review before the mind of Dr. Lee, how the following could flow from his pen is, to my mind, inexplicable.

"Of all vacuums, a head with nothing in it, is the most deplorable. A pulpit is never so vacant as when so filled. Even John Wesley, who went as far in the direction of licensing ignorance to preach as the most fastidious stickler against ministerial education can desire, felt that there was a point at which his forbearance, like gravitation shifting, turned the other way: and with his bluff honesty and common-sense earnest, he tells all such to 'contract a taste for reading, or return to their former employments;' which being interpreted, means, quit, come out of the pulpit, and stay out of it until your taste is improved and your errors corrected. The necessity for such a rebuke, was one of the gravest mistakes Wesley made.

"He sought to repair the error, at his first Conference, by a training-school for preachers. His successors at home have, only within a few years, so far controlled the effects of that first mistake as to consummate his original plan. His American followers, many of them at least, after the lapse of a hundred years and more, think his plan for educating ministers a singular infatuation: and his licensing of incompetent and uneducated men, the perfection of wisdom. His round-breasted coat still bears the order of sanctity!"

If Ross or Graves had said this much of Wesley and his preachers, with one united breath we Methodists would have cried out, "an enemy hath done this." The sentence next to the last, is very obscure—and the last, very silly. I guess the meaning is, that a portion of Mr. Wesley's American followers, regard his plan a "singular infatuation;" while others regard it, as "the perfection of wisdom."

But to begin at the beginning, brother Lee, thinks there is no vacuum so "deplorable, as a head with nothing in it." With all due deference, I think an empty heart, in association with a head filled with self-conceit, is so vastly more deplorable, that we forbear the comparison. "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of man." And perhaps I cannot do a better service to some of your readers, and especially all those that wish our young preachers "trained to know the words that man's wisdom teacheth," than to transcribe a portion of the second chapter of St. Paul's letter to the Corinthians—

1. "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God."

2. "For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified."

3. "And I was with you in weakness and in fear, and in much trembling."

4. "And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

5. "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."

With this, we might triumphantly close the debate, but for the wrong attempted to be done to the memory of that great, good man, John Wesley. Brother Lee, says, "he (Wesley) licensed ignorance to preach!"

He next shows him rebuking those ignoramuses for their inattention to reading. And next, that "the necessity for such a rebuke was the gravest mistake Wesley made. He sought to repair the error at the first Conference by a training-school for preachers."

Now, all this may be as clear as mud to the mind of the writer, but will he please tell us what error it was which Wesley sought to repair? The error of "licensing ignorance;" or, the error of the necessity? Light is greatly needed, for that the grave mistake of Wesley, could so appear as to bring down his blunt rebukes upon his own lapses (for such they were, if brother Lee is right) at and before his first Conference, will hardly bear telling.

And now, once for all, a few words about this first Conference, and its connection with ministerial education." Dr. Stevens' says: ("History of Methodism," page 214.) "It was formally asked," "can we have a Seminary for laborers yet?" Methodism was not yet sufficiently mature, especially in its finances, for the important design; the answer was, therefore, "If God spare us until another Conference." Accordingly, at the next session it was asked "can we have a Seminary for laborers yet? Not till God gives us a proper tutor," was the reply." Dr. Stevens, adds, "the inquiry was made at subsequent Conferences, and never abandoned till it was effectively answered by the establishment of the present, two well endowed "Theological Institutions" in England; and the two "Biblical Institutes," in America."

Now good reader, just look at all this. Wesley and his helpers put off this matter, "until God gives us a proper tutor."

Dr. Stevens says, in the face of this, that it was for the want of money; and Dr. Lee, thinks God had given the proper tutor—for he blames Mr. Wesley for leading out Messrs. Fletcher and Benson to Lady Huntingdon's school, at Trevecca, when he should have placed them in London or Liverpool, over a school of his own!

Will these learned doctors tell us, did or did not Mr. Wesley ever again moot the question during his natural life; which lasted near a half century after these first and second Conference.

If he did not, the whole of his after life is an emphatic negative on all such establishments. No wonder he asked that question at his first and every second Conferences, for he was not clean escaped from the fogs of Oxford—had not yet seen how able God was, of these stones to raise up children to Abraham." Every candid reader of the life of the Wesleys and of Whitefield, know well, and admit, these men of God believed at first sound of the war-trumphet that the great body of the learned and pious clergy of the established Church would wheel into line, to do valiantly for the Lord of hosts.

But it was not so. At the very moment that these holy men must have fainted in the field of holy strife God thrust out the lay-preachers, such as Maxfield and Nelson. John Wesley at first scorned such helpers, but when convinced that these men were called, sent of God, he hesitated not to license them. These things occured about the years of 1740-42. In 1744, was the first Conference.

How many ignoramuses had been licensed up to that time we are not precisely informed; not many of course; nor had there been time to make full proof of their ministry. All was experiment, in transition state. No wonder they thought, and spoke of a "Seminary for laborers." But when years of trial and success showed that such a man as Walsh could preach more gospel in an hour than thousands of the trained sons of the Church could in a life time—the project of the "Seminary for laborers" died of sheer neglect. So much for Mr. Wesley's authority, in the matter of training schools.

Once more, before we leave the extract made from brother Lee: he speak's of "fastidious sticklers against ministerial education:" Does he know any such sticklers? If he means by ministerial education, that education which young men get in Theological Seminaries, then of course such sticklers are legion; but if he means sticklers for a know-nothing ministry, such are not easily found in the Methodist E. Church.

If I am right then, such sayings as that above, are scandalous to the Church, and ought not to be made. Allow me to conclude this number, by setting forth a platform of principles, which I regard as scripturally true; and if so, I am more than vindicated for this attempt to expose the errors of Dr. Lee; 1, God calls no man to preach, who is not a converted man; 2, No man ought to preach who is not persuaded in his own mind that he is moved, and called thereto by the Holy Ghost: In other words, he must be able to say with St. Paul, "the love of Christ constrains me." "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." And with Isaiah, that fire is shut up in his bones; 3, That none are called who are destitute of common sense, or good natural ability; 4, That it is the duty of the Church to try all those preaching spirits, whether they be of God—That is, be satisfied that each man so professing, have gifts, grace and usefulness, and as these become more and more apparent, "loose him and let him go;" for if these are in him and abound, he will make an able minister of the New Testament; otherwise, all the "training-schools" in two kingdoms, cannot make a true preacher of him; 5, Every such man must "give attendance to reading"—"must study, to show himself approved," etc. otherwise, he sins; makes shipwreck of a good conscience, and ought to be stopped; 6, The objection then is not to the highest possible attainment of true ministerial excellency, but to the mode of its proposed attainment. For sooner or later, that Church which depends upon its training-schools for its supply of laborers, will ignore God's prerogative in the matters—to the extent that His kingdom will "be left to other people" a thing, He says by the Prophet, He will not do. Hence that Church which has not a ministry called and sent by the Holy Ghost, and kept by the presence and power of God, is not His true, model, living, working Church on earth.

LETTER FROM TEXAS.

MR. EDITOR.—As news from our "Empire State" is received with interest by our friends in the old States, I herewith send you a few items for publication, which I trust will not be without interest to your numerous readers.

In future communications I may give you something in reference to the various improvements and growing prospects of our young and flourishing State: in this I will only give you a few brief notes in reference to the present crops and prospects of emigration.

THE COTTON CROP looks more promising than usual at this season of the year; but its final success depends upon many contingencies, so it would be impossible at this early period of the year to calculate with any certainty as to the future yield.

THE CORN CROPS:—I have recently been through several counties and have heard from many others; and I think I may safely report a good corn crop through Eastern and Northern Texas.

From the south and west, the accounts are favorable. Notwithstanding the late frosts, the season has been quite favorable thus far in East Texas for good corn crops; and, doubtless, a heavier crop of the real staff of life will be realized this year than for many years past.

THE WHEAT CROP:—The wheat growing counties of our State are rapidly improving.

While the older counties are greatly increasing their products each year, an enterprising population is still spreading out over new counties well adapted to the production of this grain.

The crop for the present is already harvested; and is doubtless the heaviest ever made in Texas. While the yield per acre is good, there is a larger number of acres in cultivation this year than any previous one.

There being no railroad as yet penetrating this part of the country, there will doubtless be a heavy surplus left on hand, to be offered at merely nominal prices. But in a future communication, we will tell you something about the prospects of a railroad, and of this surplus being carried off.

Don't be astonished when I tell you this will soon be the wheat growing State of the Union.

OTHER GRAINS:—All kinds of small grain do well in portions of Eastern and Northern Texas. This year, oats, rye and barley have done very well.

In the Prairie counties farmers are just beginning to appreciate these grains; an increased quantity is being sowed each year. In consequence of the dryness of the season in the Prairies, the corn crop is frequently a failure; but these grains seldom fail—with plenty of small grain and our wide spread Prairie pastures, our horses, swine, sheep and cattle are perfectly safe, whether we make corn or not.

PRICES:—Bread-stuffs will be in greater abundance and at lower prices than for many years past. The present time being a propitious one, it is expected that a heavy tide of emigration will set in toward Texas this fall.

If any of our friends in the old States desire to better their temporal circumstances by moving to a new country, they could not, probably, do better than come to Texas at this time.

Corn, it is thought from the abundant prospect, will not be worth in the fall more than from twenty-five to fifty cents per bushel.

In the wheat growing counties wheat is now rating at fifty cents per bushel, and it will probably be lower.

Flour, in the same region, at the mills is worth, for common to fine, from $1 25 to $1 75 per hundred pounds. Superfine is worth from $2 00 to $2 75.

The place where I am writing from is 130 to 150 miles from the centre of the wheat growing region. Flour is hauled the above distance and sold here, the best superfine at $3 50 per hundred pounds. And by the way, let me here say that the best judges think the Texas flour better than any brought from New Orleans or St Louis.

In a future communication I hope to give your readers a more particular view of the wheat growing counties of Texas. Its soil, water, timber, health, productions, advantages and disadvantages, improvements, etc., etc.

Texas is now rapidly filling up with a moral, intelligent and enterprising population—just the kind we want—and lands are rapidly rising in value; yet good land can be had, and plenty of it, at quite moderate prices; and in some sections of the country, at very low rates.

The present season would be a favorable time for those who desire homes in a rich and flourishing country to come and take a peep at our "Empire State."

Tell such, Mr. Editor, to step over during the time of our camp and protracted meetings, and see if Texas will not compare favorably, in a moral, religious and intellectual point of view, with any of the old States.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you would be pleased to step over to Texas during the Summer or Fall we will promise you plenty of "something good too eat," and plenty of hard work in the pulpit and at the altar to keep you from getting the dyspepsia. We would be heartily glad to see you make some "foot prints" across, at least a portion of the continent of Texas this Fall. Can't you come?

May God bless you—the Advocate—and your readers!

THE LAST SCENE OF WASHINGTON'S LIFE.

Irving's new Life of Washington, in five volumes has just been completed. In the fifth volume, after giving a succinct narrative of the Administration of Washington, his retirement from office, and his mode of life at Mount Vernon, Mr. Irving brings the work to a close with the following description of the final scene: Winter had now set in, with occasional wind, and rain, and frost, yet Washington still kept up his active round of indoor and outdoor avocations, as his diary records. He was in full health and vigor, dined out occasionally, and had frequent guests at Mount Vernon, and, as usual, was part of every day in the saddle, going the rounds of his estates, and in his military phraseology, "visiting the outposts."

He had recently walked with his favorite nephew about the grounds, showing the improvements he intended to make, and had especially pointed out the spot where he purposed building a new family vault, the old one being damaged by the roots of trees which had overgrown it and caused it to leak. "This change," said he, "I shall make the first of all, for I may require it before the rest."

"When I parted from him," added the nephew, "he stood on the steps of the front door, where he took leave of myself and another. It was a bright frosty morning; he had taken his usual ride, and the clear healthy flush on his cheek, and his sprightly manner, brought the remark from both of us that we had never seen the General look so well. I have sometimes thought him decidedly the handsomest man I ever saw, and when in a lively mood, so full of pleasantry, so agreeable to all with whom he associated, that I could hardly realize he was the same Washington, whose dignity awed all who approached him."

For some time past Washington had been occupied in digesting a complete system on which his estate was to be managed for several succeeding years; specifying the cultivation of the several farms, with tables designating the rotation of crops. It occupied thirty folio pages, and was executed with that clearness and method which characterized all his business papers. This was finished on the 10th of December, and was accompanied by a letter of that date to his manager or steward. It is a valuable document, showing the soundness and vigor of his intellect at this advanced stage of his existence, and the love of order that reigned throughout his affairs. "My greatest anxiety," said he on a previous occasion, "is to have all these concerns in such a clear and distinct form that no reproach may attach itself to me when I have taken my departure for the land of spirits."

It was evident, however, that, full of health and vigor, he looked forward to his long-cherished hope, the enjoyment of a serene old age in this home of his heart.

According to his diary, the morning on which these voluminous instructions to his steward were dated, was clear and calm, but the afternoon was lowering. The next day—11th—he notes there was wind and rain, and "at a night large circle round the moon."

The morning of the 12th was overcast. That morning he wrote a letter to Hamilton, heartily approving of a plan for a military academy, which the latter has submitted to the Secretary of War.

About 10 o'clock he mounted his horse and rode out as usual to make the rounds of the estate. The ominous ring round the moon, which he had observed on the preceding night, proved a fatal portent. "About 1 o'clock," he notes, "it began to snow, soon after to hail, and then turned to a settled cold rain." Having on an overcoat, he continued his ride without regarding the weather, and did not return to the house till after three.

His secretary approached him with letters to be franked, that they might be taken to the post-office in the evening. Washington franked the letters, but observed that the weather was too bad to send a servant out with them. Mr. Lear perceived that snow was hanging from his hair, and expressed his fears that he had got wet; but he replied, "No, his great-coat had kept him dry." As dinner had been waiting for him, he sat down to the table without changing his dress. "In the evening," writes his secretary, "he appeared as well as usual."

On the following morning the snow was three inches deep and still falling, which prevented him from taking his usual ride. He complained of a sore throat, and had evidently taken cold the day before. In the afternoon the weather cleared up, and he went out on the grounds between the house and the river, to mark some trees which were to be cut down. A hoarseness which had hung about him through the day grew worse toward night, but he made light of it.

He was very cheerful in the evening, as he sat in the parlor with Mrs. Washington and Mr. Lear, amusing himself with the papers which had been brought from the post-office. When he met with anything interesting or entertaining, he would read it aloud as well as his hoarseness would permit, or he listened and made occasional comments while Mr. Lear read the debates of the Virginia Assembly.

On retiring to bed, Mr. Lear suggested that he should take something to relieve his cold. "No," replied he, "you know I never take anything for a cold. Let it go as it came."

In the night he was taken extremely ill with ague and difficulty of breathing. Between two and three o'clock in the morning he awoke Mrs. Washington, who would have risen to call a servant, but he would not permit her, lest she should take cold. At day-break, when the servant woman entered to make a fire, she was sent to call Mr. Lear. He found the General breathing with difficulty, and hardly able to utter a word intelligibly. Washington desired that Dr. Craik, who lived in Alexandria, should be sent for, and that in the mean time Rawlins, one of the overseers, should be summoned, to bleed him before the doctor could arrive.

A gargle was prepared for his throat, but whenever he attempted to swallow any of it, he was convulsed and almost suffocated. Rawlins made his appearance soon after sunrise, but when the General's arm was ready for the operation, became agitated. "Don't be afraid," said the General, as well as he could speak. Rawlins made an incision. "The orifice is not large enough," said Washington. The blood, however, ran pretty freely, and Mrs. Washington, uncertain whether the treatment was proper, and fearful that too much blood might be taken, begged Mr. Lear to stop it. When he was about to untie the string the General put up his hand to prevent him, and as soon as he could speak murmured, "more, more;" but Mrs. Washington's doubts prevailed, and the bleeding was stopped, after about half a pint of blood had been taken. External applications were now made to the throat, and his feet were bathed in warm water, but without affording any relief.

His old friend, Dr. Craik, arrived between eight and nine, and two other physicians, Drs. Dick and Brown, were called in. Various remedies were tried, and additional bleeding, but all of no avail.

"About half-past four o'clock," writes Mr. Lear, "he desired me to call Mrs. Washington to his bedside, when he requested her to go down into his room, and take from his desk two wills which she would find there, and bring them to him, which she did. Upon looking at them, he gave her one, which he observed was useless, as being superseded by the other, and desired her to burn it, which she did, and took the other and put it into her closet.

"After this was done, I returned to his bedside and took his hand. He said to me: 'I find I am going; my breath can not last long. I believed from the first that the disorder would prove fatal. Do you arrange all my military letters and papers. Arrange my accounts and settle my books, as you know more about them than any one else; and let Mr. Rawlins finish recording my other letters which he has begun.' I told him this would be done. He then asked me if I recollected any thing which it was essential for him to do, as he had a very short time to continue with us. I told him that I could recollect nothing; but that I hoped he was not so near his end. He observed, smiling, that he certainly was, and that, as it was the debt which we must all pay, he looked to the event with perfect resignation."

In the course of the afternoon he appeared to be in great pain and distress from the difficulty of breathing, and frequently changed his posture in the bed. Mr. Lear endeavored to raise him and turn him with as much ease as possible. "I am afraid I fatigue you too much," the General would say. Upon being assured to the contrary, "Well," observed he gratefully, "it is a debt we must pay to each other, and I hope when you want aid of this kind you will find it."

His servant, Christopher, had been in the room during the day, and almost the whole time on his feet. The General noticed it in the afternoon, and kindly told him to sit down.

About five o'clock his old friend, Dr. Craik, came again into the room, and approached the bedside. "Doctor," said the General, "I die hard, but I am not afraid to go. I believed, from my first attack, that I should not survive it—my breath can not last long." The doctor pressed his hand in silence, retired from the bedside, and sat by the fire absorbed in grief.

Between five and six the other physicians came in, and he was assisted to sit up in his bed. "I feel I am going," said he; I thank you for your attentions, but I pray you to take no more trouble about me; let me go off quietly; I can not last long." He lay down again; all retired except Dr. Craik. The General continued uneasy and restless, but without complaining, frequently asking what hour it was.

Further remedies were tried without avail in the evening. He took whatever was offered him, did as he was desired by the physicians, and never uttered sigh or complaint.

"About ten o'clock," writes Mr. Lear, "he made several attempts to speak to me before he could effect it. At length he said, 'I am just going. Have me decently buried, and do not let my body be put into the vault in less than three days after I am dead.' I bowed assent, for I could not speak. He then looked at me again and said, 'Do you understand me?' I replied, 'Yes.' 'Tis well,' said he.

"About ten minutes before he expired (which was between ten and eleven o'clock, on the night of December 14, 1799,) his breathing became easier. He lay quietly; he withdrew his hand from mine and felt his own pulse. I saw his countenance change. I spoke to Dr. Craik, who sat by the fire. He came to the bedside. The General's hand fell from his wrist. I took it in mine and pressed it to my bosom. Dr. Craik put his hand over his eyes, and he expired without a struggle or a sigh.

"While we were fixed in silent grief, Mrs. Washington, who was seated at the foot of the bed, asked, with a firm and collected voice, 'Is he gone?' I could not speak, but held up my hand as a signal that he was no more. 'Tis well,' said she in the same voice. All is now over; I shall soon follow him; I have no more trials to pass through.'"

VICTOR EMANUEL THE SOLDIER.

Among the combatants in the Italian war, says the London Times, no one seems more entitled to the Victoria Cross than Victor Emanuel himself. We are not now speaking of his higher qualities as a General, but simply of his brilliant valor as a soldier. He has displayed conspicuous courage in the presence of the enemy. Considering his position, and the evils which would be entailed on his country, were he to meet with a soldier's death in the field, he may be said to have pushed courage to the verge of rashness. An excess of valor is, however, a fault which men readily pardon, the more especially when a King is the hero. As to the fact, there can be no doubt, the three armies contain no braver man than Victor Emanuel King of Sardinia. The two Emperors who are his competitors in the race for military glory, must approve themselves, stout and true soldiers if they would not see the palm of superior valor awarded to the Sardinian King. Wherever the fight is thickest and the fire hottest, there Victor Emanuel is to be found.

On Tuesday, at the battle of Palestro, he pushed forward in person into the midst of the combatants, and would not be persuaded to retire into a safer position. The Zouave soldiers—no incompetent judges of military daring—endeavored in vain to restrain him; he would not understand the propriety of retreat. Even if this reckless exposure of his own life is not a quality much to be commended in a General, at least it will win for him the rough sympathies and ready obedience of the camp. The soldier will cheerfully follow the chief who leads him on. Troops would be ashamed to fall back when they see their General, and that General a crowned King, in advance. The Sardinian army, however, have shown themselves worthy of the chivalrous guidance of their King. To them belong the honors of Montebello. The action of the Sardinian cavalry during that affair seems to have decided at the most critical moment the fortunes of the day. On this more recent occasion of Palestro it was the Fourth division of the Sardinian army, commanded by the King in person, which inflicted so decisive a check upon the enemy.

Attacked by 25,000 Austrians, and supported only by a regiment of Zouaves, this Division of the Sardinian Army not only retained its position, but defeated the enemy with great slaughter. The victory was more decisive than that of Montebello. This time, the Austrians can scarcely say that, "having accomplished their purpose," they retired because they wished to retire. It was to them an important object to hinder the junction of the Sardinians with Canrobert, and in this they entirely failed. They were fairly defeated, leaving numerous prisoners and guns in the hands of the enemy. This victory was won, we repeat it, by the Sardinians, with their King at their head.

HOW TO BE A MAN.

To know one's self a man is to repent of sin. Strange as this may sound, it is the first step towards real manhood. That man was made for virtue and not for vice—for holiness and not sin—is evident from all the adaptations of his moral constitution. But that he has violated the laws of his moral nature and become positively vicious is evident to all. Now, the only natural or possible mode of correcting his vitiated moral nature is to repent. No other act has the least tendency towards it. Repentance, therefore, is not only manly, but is the first truly manly act a human being is capable of. Such is the universality of human wickedness that all moral acts, previous to repentance, are selfish, and unworthy of a man. I am aware that repentance is looked upon as a weakness; but it is the most heroic of acts. It is self-subjection—a triumph over one's worst foes—those of his own household; yea, those of his own heart! I am not speaking of the servile cowering of the sycophant; but the honest and generous return to duty of the erring subject of the great God—an acknowledgment [of the rights of the Creator and Benefactor of the Universe. It is establishing the supremacy of virtue in a self-refined soul. To prostrate one's self before the Great Jehovah and ingenuously confess his transgressions, and abandon them forever, shows a perception of right, and evinces an integrity of purpose which is truly exalted and manly. But for a moral being to persist in wrong against the dictates of his judgment, and under the lash of a guilty conscience, argues any thing but manliness.

Viewed by the standard of universal right, man is in ruins. His heart is a moral wreck, and his ignorance of the fact is one of its most melancholy effects. Now, I ask, if the only retrograde process from vice to virtue, from misery to bliss, and that process approved and urged by every power of the soul, is not a manly process! I say, then, to the persevering transgressor of God's law, "Show thyself a man," and repent of your sin. To the self-enslaved drunkard or epicure, I would say, show yourself a man, and subject your body to the spirit. And to the lover of the world, I would still say, show thyself a man, and trample idols in the dust. Repentance, meanness! What else is honorable? Is justice mean? What faculty of your mind says it? But repentance is only justice to God and man. Every sin is a blow at the throne of God and a stab at the heart of man. Sin is an infraction of the law that guards the throne, and protect the interest of the universe, and its criminality and ill-desert is measured only by the magnitude of those interests. And can it be deemed manly to persevere in transgression? Every power and faculty of man's tribune nature answers, no! A wretched, sin-cursed race cries out, no! All the angelic world above, and all the demoniac tribes beneath, unite their testimony against the manliness of continued transgression!

FAMILY RELATIONS OF THE CZAR AND THE EMPEROR.

IT IS A fact which is not generally known that the families of the Czar of Russia and the Emperor of France are connected by marriage. A son of Eugene Beauharnais, who was married to the daughter of the King of Bavaria, married a sister of the present Emperor Alexandria of Russia. Eugene was the son of the Empress Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon. One of her grandsons is the present Emperor of France. Another is the husband of the sister of the Emperor of Russia. One of her grand-daughters, by Eugene, is the present Queen of Sweden. Another grand-son, who is now dead, married the Queen of Portugal. Still another grand-daughter, by Eugene, is the Empress of Brazil.

THIRTY-THREE STARS must be on the National Flag from and after the 4th July next. TERMS—$2 00 PER ANNUM, IN ADVANCE.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JULY 6, 1859

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

THE volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of FIFTY CENTS A WEEK.

Thus, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of all subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.

THUS far we have a healthy city. No cases of yellow fever have yet occurred—and no indications of an epidemic visitation. Weather warm, with copious showers almost daily. Our readers can rely upon the Advocate. Where the fever comes we shall tell them; a straightforward course in this matter is the best. The absence of yellow fever in Havana and Vera Cruz, leads us to hope that we shall have none here. Meanwhile the Quarantine is enforced with all possible strictness.

WEEDS IN PICTURES.

A WEED is said to be "a plant out of place." An excellent definition; for, what is there, when appropriately placed, that deserves this name for vexatious worthlessness? But a weed is often in its very place, when well painted. We have learned to look upon many vegetable reprobates with an eye of favor. Some weeds are exquisitely beautiful in structure, in flower, or in leaf-forms, when closely examined. The habits of others make them subjects of great interest. We recollect once, while strolling with one of the first landscape artists of America, before one of Boddington's views of the Thames, whose banks were clothed (pictorially) with magnificent aquatic plants, being surprised to hear him say that in America we had few large, succulent plants fit for an artist among our native weeds. Since that time we have never gone into any meadow or field without noticing the plants as subjects of portraiture. And I feel sure that there can be no excuse for barrenness in the foregrounds of landscapes from want of material. It is the want of industry, or the want of real love for weed-like plants, that occasions such meager or conventional pictures. It is seldom that we see plants rendered, as Landseer or Rosa Bonheur render animals, with an enthusiasm of love that never tires; that never can enough repeat them. If our right hand had been endowed with cunning, we believe that the humbler growths of the field should occupy much of its skill. But one must love well to paint well. If a man does not respect a plant, if it exerts upon him no positive and pleasurable influence, he is unfit to represent it. A nurse that does not love children can never take good care of them; and an artist that does not love what are called weeds, cannot do them justice. Some ridicule has been thrown upon our young artists for painting grasses so much. That they paint them at all is their praise; and that they confine themselves to so few, and repeat their work so often, as if there were but half a dozen species in the world fit for admiration, is their real fault. Instead of but few striking and effective plants, in any direction, growing abundantly, there are so many that one might well be embarrassed by riches.

There is the Dock family. None can be less pretentious or more meritorious. What if it does grow in dank and shaded places? What a breadth of leaf the Burr-dock exhibits, what vigor of health, what an oak-like spread of branches, when its blossom stem is fully extended! There too, is the relishful Horse-radish, of a broad and long palm. The Elecampane is another plant of generous leaf. Laying aside all prejudices, who can deny great merit, as a robust and vigorous plant, to the Skunk-cabbage? What if its odor is an indisputable fact? Art, in this respect, has the advantage of Nature. In a picture its peculiar and delicate green would be beautiful, without the least odor.

Among upright plants the Milkweed is notable. Not for its grace, but for its full habit and generous bearing. The thistles, the brier-family, the sedges, the cat-tail, the water-plantain family, the bind-weed, the woodbine and the blackberry, both upright and creeping, than which, in early leaf, in blossom or in fruit, at every stage, nothing can be more graceful and beautiful—these all deserve careful study.

The Mullein need hardly be mentioned, as it figures in pictures already. But what would be more exquisite than the spray of Asparagus, if well rendered? There, too, is the Golden-Rod, the Aster, the Iron-weed (vernonia,) the Smart-weed, the Teasel, and a hundred more—admirable chiefly for ornamental designs and decorative [illegible] but likewise, fit elements for the foregrounds of landscapes. It is worthy of notice that the plants most valuable for culture on our continent, are those which are most beautiful for ornamental design, viz., wheat, rye, and barley, the Indian corn, the cotton and tobacco plants, the grapes and the grape. The potato, poor lowly fellow, has no merit except in its blossom; but almost all the plants which form the staple crops, are universally beloved of artists.

It is amusing to read the descriptions of weeds in agricultural books. Editors are bound to look upon weeds only in relation to farming. If a thing be prolific, tenacious of life, and voracious of food, no matter how graceful its form or comely its blossom, it is hated, and all the ugly names of the vocabulary are heaped on it. But that should not prevent the admiration of those who have no crops to tend. A pestilent weed may yet be exquisitely ornamental.

We are quite sure that it is the artist's fault if he is deficient in succulent foliage, in herbaceous riches, in all graceful stems and twining vines. Instead of a destitution of such elements, our woods, our low wet meadows, our hedges, and hill-sides, are full of them. It requires only diligence in finding and industry in representing them to make every landscape artist's portfolio rich in vegetable treasures. [Independent.]

DEATH-BED CONVERSION.

"FOR myself, I never met with one decisive evidence of a saving change in a malefactor's cell; and out of many hundreds, I can quote exceedingly few in the chamber of a last and fatal disease." So spake Dr. Chalmers in his farewell address at the St. John's chapel; and his experience and testimony on this point are those of most ministers of the gospel. Certainly they are our own, after the observation and test which a pastorate of twenty years affords us; and we might specify numerous instances in illustration and confirmation of the truth of this avowal. A recent case was that of a young lady dangerously sick, and in great anguish of spirit, whom we were sent for to visit. She gave fixed and earnest attention to the way of salvation as it was opened before her, and seemed very clearly to pass through the stages of conviction and conversion. Inquiry was exchanged for profession, anxiety for hope, and distress for joy. Had she died, her pious relatives would not have doubted that the last of earth proved to her the first of heaven, and it is our remarks at her funeral we had not signified as much, we should have been pronounced uncharitable. She, however, recovered, and with her recovery all evidences of her piety fled; and when we reminded her of what she told us during her illness indicative of a change of heart, her only reply was that "she had not the slightest recollection of having ever said any such things."

It is the testimony of a distinguished physician in our land—a professed Christian, who adorns that profession, that out of more than a hundred cases that had come under his observation of the apparent conversion of individuals, who, in near approach of death had recovered, but three of the number subsequently gave any good evidence of having been regenerated. And an English physician once stated that out of three hundred cases which he had known of individuals, who, apparently with one foot in the grave, had thought themselves renewed by the grace of God, only ten of them on their recovery had not turned to their former courses of sin and folly.

"Tell me not how a man dies," said President Dwight, "but how he lives." "And," observes the excellent Rev. Mr. Booth, "I pay more attention to people's lives than to their deaths. In all the visits I have paid to the sick during the course of a long ministry, I never met with one who was not previously serious, that ever recovered from what he supposed the brink of death, who afterwards performed his vows and became religious, notwithstanding the very great appearance there was in their favour when they thought they could not recover." It hath been with them in accordance with the proverb, "The dog hath returned to his vomit, again, and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire."

THE MILLER AND HIS BIBLE.

IN a town situated in Putnam county, N. Y., there is a grist mill, to which my heart turns as a consecrated place. Being in the neighborhood of the mill a few weeks ago, I went to it with my boys, for the purpose of showing them its machinery and the process of making flour. The miller received us kindly, and without neglecting his duties, gave us every opportunity to gratify the curiosity that had brought us to the place. Opening a little door in one apartment of the mill, he showed us the great wheel that moved patiently around, under the weight of the falling water, and gave his own motion and power to all the wheels and shafts and burr-stones throughout the building. Here the wheat was shaken out of the bopper, and falling between the upper and nether mill-stones, was ground to power. In these little buckets attached to an ever-moving belt, the flour and the bran, mingled together, were raised from the first story of the mill to the third, and thrown into the "bolt," a long hexagon or octagon, covered with silk, and constantly turning. And as the bolting and sifting went on, the bran was thrown out of the bolt, at one end, while the clean, beautiful flour, "the finest of the wheat," fell through the meshes of the silk and was caught below.

All this was new and interesting to the boys; and in their eagerness to see, they quite forgot that every thing in the mill was covered with flour; so that before they left they became almost as white as the miller himself. I hope they may become as good. From the first, I was greatly pleased with his sunny face and obliging manners; but when I discovered the secret of his kindness, my heart was firmly knit to his, and shall be, I trust, for ever. On one of the steps of the stairway leading to the upper story of the building, there was an open and well-worn pocket Bible. It was lying just where he could have most easy access to it, without neglecting his work; and it was very evident that he made it his constant companion.

As we were about leaving the mill, I thanked the miller for his kindness, and told him that while I was much interested in all I had seen, his open Bible had given me more pleasure than anything else.

"His quiet answer was, "It teaches me how to take toll."

"Yes," I added, "and how to reach heaven."

With this, his face became more sunny than ever, and for a few moments we enjoyed such communion as the world cannot understand. As we talked of the precious work of God, the love of Jesus, and the work of the Holy Spirit, our hearts burned within us; and we parted cheered with the hope that we shall soon renew our communion, and "love as brethren," in our Father's house above.

The humble miller, I found on inquiry, was dear to all the people of God who knew him. Even the men of the world confide in his honesty; and well they may, for his Bible "teaches him how to take toll." Let me add his name to the list of my personal friends, and like him search the Scriptures daily as my infallible guide in all the vocations of life.—New York Observer.

AN EMINENT MINISTER'S FIRST SERMON.

THE following anecdote, in relation to Mr. Jay's early preaching, I had from his own lips.

Mr. Winter being unable, through ill health, to comply with an engagement to preach a few miles in the country on the following day (Sunday,) requested me to officiate for him. I told my tutor that though he had given me but little time for preparation (it then being late in the evening,) yet I would do the best I could to acquit myself of the duty. On reaching the village where the service was to be performed quite fatigued, having travelled on foot, I inquired for the residence of Winter's friend, a wealthy farmer, who was the head of the religious interest of the place and surrounding neighborhood. On arriving there, I gave a timorous rap at the door, and on its being opened, informed the female servant that I wished to see the gentleman of the house. The domestic asked me what I wanted of her master at so late an hour. My reply was, that Mr. Winter had sent me in his place to supply the chapel on the Sunday, and desired me personally to see her master on the subject. The servant, after bidding me go into the kitchen, said she would deliver my message, which she did with a smile on her countenance, telling her master that Mr. Winter had sent a farmer's boy, with hobnail shoes and worsted stockings to preach in his stead. Upon the gentleman farmer making his appearance in the kitchen, he, after eyeing me from head to foot, said:—"So my young friend, Mr. Winter has sent you to preach here; is it so?" "Yes sir," was my reply. The gentleman without entering into further conversation with me, said in a low tone of voice to his servant, which I overheard. "Who will Winter send here next!" and then after bidding the servant give me some supper, and get a bed ready for me in the top room of the house, abruptly took his departure.

The next morning, whilst I was on the road on foot to the chapel to perform my duties there, a carriage passed by me containing the rich farmer and his lady, who, although they saw me, would not recognize me. This slight did not much discompose me, for my mind was intent upon the preparation of my discourse, from a text which had occurred to me whilst in bed, as being appropriate to the circumstances of my reception, my appearance as to dress, and my youth. The text was from the sixth chapter of John, 9th verse, "There is a lad here who hath five barley loaves and two small fishes." In the course of my extemporaneous discourse which soon rivitted the deep attention of the rural audience, I exclaimed:—"Did God despise a lad who supplied the Son of Man with food for the great multitude, in number about five thousand? No. Was it not a lad—a ruddy-faced lad—who slew Goliath the giant, and afterwards cut off his head with the great sword of that Philistine, thereby giving deliverance to Israel? Yes. And was it not a lad by whose lips God reproved the aged and hoary-headed Eli? Yes. Why, then, despise a lad?"

When I retired to the vestry, the wealthy farmer, who was there waiting for me, shook me heartily by the hand, thanked me in the most flattering terms for what he was pleased to style my excellent discourse, and made me his guest until my departure on the following day. I need hardly mention that instead of returning from the chapel to the gentleman's residence on foot, I was invited into the carriage, and treated with the greatest hospitality.—Recollections of Mr. Jay.

BOOKS AND PERIODICALS.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT: with a critically Revised Text: a Digest of Various Readings: Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage: prolegomena: and a critical and Exegetical Commentary. For the use of theological students and ministers. By Henry Alford, B. D., minister of Quebec Chapel, London: and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. In four volumes. Vol. 1, containing the four Gospels. New York: Harper and Brother's, Publishers, 1859.

This is a work of great value to minister's of the Gospel, and to all critical students of the New Testament. The Greek type is refreshingly clear and beautiful. We take from the New York Observer the following notice, which will put our readers in possession of the main features and merits of the work.

"Some ten years ago Mr. Alford published the first volume of his edition of the New Testament. Three successive editions have appeared in England; the last of which has been re-printed by the Harper's. Their edition is a fac-simile of the English, and is issued at a price which brings it within the reach of ministers and theological students, for whose use it is specially intended. The principal features of the work are:—

1. The Greek Text, adopted by the Editor as the one best supported by the manuscript authorities and the soundest canons of criticism.

2. A Digest of the Various Readings found in all the manuscripts which have been collected, in the ancient versions, and in the citations of the Fathers.

3. Marginal References, relating mainly to verbal and idiomatic usage.

4. A brief critical and exegetical Commentary.

The special value of the work consists in the Text, and in the Digest of Various Readings. This Digest is so complete and thorough that we feel no hesitation in saying that no reading or variation, whether occuring in any manuscript, or suggested by any early version or any patristic citation, which has the slightest claim to reception is unnoticed; and in every case full means are given to the student to decide upon the value of the evidence upon which any disputed reading is either admitted or rejected. He has not merely the opinions of the Editor, but the whole chain of evidence from which that opinion has been formed. To express that chain of evidence in a narrow compass is the crowning excellence of Mr. Alford as an editor.

This editinn, from its nature, is specially designed for ministers and theological students. For them, it is unnecessary to speak of the value of a work, which in the space of a single volume contains not only the text of the Evangelical Record, but a complete summary of all the evidence upon which every word and phrase has been admitted into that text. The student has before him all the data in possession of Scholz and Griesbach and Tischendorf and Alford. Granting him equal intelligence and candor, he is as well prepared as either to decide upon the authenticity of the text.

The publishers have given the volume an exterior form worthy of its intrinsic merits. The specimen page will vouch for the clearness and distinctness of the type, and the facility of reference furnished by the ingenious use in the notes of catchwords in a peculiar letter. No pains have been spared to ensure typographical accuracy. In the course of a somewhat extended examination we have detected only a single error, and that merely in the interpunction of a Hebrew phrase. It is, however, not to be supposed that in a work of such magnitude some errors should not have escaped the most careful proof-reader: and we are authorized by the Publishers to say they will thankfully receive notice of any error, either in the printing of the text or in the references and citations; and that all such shall be noted for correction in future editions."

COSMOS: A SKETCH OF A PHYSICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE UNIVERSE. By Alexander Von Humboldt. Translated from the German, by E. C. Otte and W. S. Dallas, F. L. S. Vol. 5. New York: Harper & Brothers, 12mo, pp. 462.

This is the completion of what has been called "the great work of the age." The volume now before us, is uniform with the four volumes issued by the Harpers in 1852, and completes the edition of the great philosopher's last and greatest work. It is of interest to the student of natural science, and also to the general reader. Pedantic technicalities are for the most part avoided. The style is comprehensive and concise, pleasing and intelligible to all. The present volume is devoted to the more important phenomena of the earth; including the determination of its size, form and density, with a full account of earthquakes and volcanos.

THE BERTRAMS. A novel. By Anthony Trollope, author of Barchester Towers, Doctor Thorne, etc. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859.

The above noticed books are laid on our table by H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp street, New Orleans.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE. We are also indebted to Mr. McGinnis for an early copy of this popular Monthly. Editor's Table gives us "European Armies and Arms," a valuable and entertaining subject just now. The contents and illustrations are not a whit behind the previous number—rather ahead we think. Let us specify—"A Visit to John Brown's Tract," "The Flea," and "John Wesley," as specially good.

NEW ORLEANS MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL. July, 1859. This able Journal maintains its well-earned reputation. The contents of the present number are of more than usual interest to the non-professional reader.

LADIES' REPOSITORY, for July, is received. A glance at the Contents promises a treat, when we have time to read it. It is embellished with engravings, of Lake Pepin, from Table Rock, and a well executed likeness of Gov. Wright, a Methodist, and our present Minister-plenipotentiary at Berlin.

REFLECTION ONLY, GIVE OPINIONS WEIGHT.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON once said to an intimate friend: "Men give me some credit for genius. All the genius that I have lies just in this: When I have a subject in hand, I study it profoundly. Day and night it is before me. I explore it in all its bearings. My mind becomes pervaded with it. Then the effort which I make is what the people are pleased to call the fruit of genius. It is the fruit of labor and thought."

Mr. Webster once replied to a gentleman who pressed him to speak on a subject of great importance: "The subject interests me deeply, but I have no time. There, sir," pointing to a huge pile of letters on the table, "is a pile of unanswered letters, to which I must reply before the close of the session, (which was then three days off) I have no time to master the subject as as to do it justice."

"But, Mr. Webster, a few words from you would do so much to awaken public attention to it."

"If there be such weight in my words as you represent, it is because I do not allow myself to speak on any subject till I have imbued my mind with it."

Demosthenes was once urged to speak on a great and sudden emergency. "I am not prepared," said he and obstinately refused.

The law of labor is equally binding on genius and mediocrity

AN IMPERIAL SENSATION DOCUMENT.

HAVING already published the general news summary from our regular correspondent, we give below Napoleon's proclamation to the Lombards, and the London Times comments thereon. The following proclamation has been published at Milan:

"The fortune of war has conducted me to the capital of Lombardy. Let me tell you why I am here. When Austria unjustly attacked Piedmont. I resolved to sustain the King of Sardinia, my ally. The honor and interests of France made this my duty. Your enemies, who are my enemies, have endeavored to diminish the sympathy which exists throughout all Europe for your cause, by trying to persuade the world that I am carrying on this war only for personal ambition or to aggrandize the territory of France. If there are men who do not understand their epoch, I am not of that number. In the enlightened state of public opinion which prevails, men are greater by the moral influence which they exercise, than by barren conquests, and this moral influence I seek after with pride, in contributing to emancipate one of the most beautiful parts of Europe. Your reception has already proved to me that you have understood me."

"I do not come with any preconceived plan to dispossess sovereigns nor to impose my own will upon you. My army will only occupy itself with two things—to combat your enemies and to maintain internal order. It will place no obstacle in the way of a free manifestation of your legitimate wishes. Providence sometimes favors nations like individuals in giving them occasion to rise suddenly to greatness; but it is on condition that they have the virtue to profit by it.

"Profit then by the fortune which is offered you. Your desire of independence, so long expressed, so often deceived, will be realized if you show yourselves worthy of it. Unite then, for one sole object, the enfranchisement of your country. Seek military organization. Hasten, all of you, to place yourselves under the flag of King Emanuel, who has already so nobly shown you the path of honor. Remember that without discipline there is no army, and animated with the sacred fire of patriotism, be nothing to-day but soldiers, to-morrow you will be free citizens of a great country.

The London Times, on Napoleon's Milan Proclamation.

Napoleon Third has, in his address to the inhabitants of Milan, says the London Times, June 14, reiterated all his promises, and he retains to himself the character of the disinterested regenerator of Italy. He declares that he is not one of those men who cannot comprehend the spirit of their age; and that he does not appear in Italy to further his own objects of personal ambition, or to aggrandize the territory of France. To do this would be, in the opinion of Napoleon Third, not only a wicked, but a foolish act; for the time is come when moral influences are fruitful and victories are sterile. Napoleon Third only enters Milan as the liberator of Italy. He comes only to give freedom to the finest part of Europe.

He promises the Lombards that, if they will he his soldiers to-day, they shall to-morrow be the free citizens of a great country. He has sworn to the Italians to combat their enemies—to maintain for them domestic order, and to throw no obstacle in the way of the manifestation of their wishes. To the Germans, who are so unquiet in their homes, and who are living in their places of strength, he puts forth protestations equally explicit, which have the additional guarantee of being endorsed by the Emperor of Russia.

Cotemporaneously with the publication of the French Emperor's address to the people of Milan, we have the Russian circular declaring the policy of that Empire during the existence of the Italian war. France gives her imperial promises to Italy. Russia at once soothes, re-assures and threatens Germany. France insists she was called to this war by her interests and her honor, and that she has no other object but to defend her ally, who was unjustly attacked, and to give liberty to Italy.

Russia declares that Austria has been altogether in the wrong, and that her objection to the admission of Sardinia to conference, was at once unreasonable and unjust, and that in the negotiations which succeeded the French Government has honestly seconded the efforts of those powers who were sincerely desirous of peace. Russia, therefore, is with France in sentiment; but as the war itself cannot be averted, she will use all her efforts to localize the evil and to confine it to the country where events called it forth. She tells Germany that for her there is no cause of fear—that the Emperor of the French has given assurances which Russia abundantly believes, that no enterprise is in prospect which will injure the interests or dignity of the great power of which Prussia is the head and natural protector. France has a righteous quarrel with Austria, and Russia will stand by and see it fairly fought out. The war should not spread beyond, and it shall not be quenched in Italy. Russia very significantly intimates that if Germany interferes in this matter, so long as it remains only an Italian quarrel, Russia will also interfere, and restore the equilibrium of the contest.

We must take it that these two crowned heads are sincere in the profession they thus publicly put forward to the world. We must believe Napoleon, when he has driven the Austrians from Italy—will hand over Italy to the Italians—will unite Lombardy with Piedmont—will secularize the government of the Roman States—will give back to Naples its constitution, and accord guarantees for its continuance. We must give our confidence to Russia, that when she favors this chivalrous course, she also has an hidden object in view, that she also has sympathy with Italy, and if any other motive mingles with her pity, it is only a not unnatural desire to pour some slight humiliation upon the head of Austria, and to exalt Prussia at the expense of her rival.

It is not to be suggested that these State papers should speak that which is not true. When two great sovereigns come forward to protest before Europe, their policy is of a conservative and disinterested character, and that if they are fighting battles and conquering kingdoms, it is for the progress of civilization, for the advance of moral influences, and not from selfish motives, we are bound to believe them, not indeed to throw ourselves off our guard, but still to believe them. We cannot cease from our astonishment that these things should be so, we cannot even yet quite comprehend how the Emperor Napoleon should wish to build up in Italy a form of government which would be inconvenient to him in France; still less can we understand why Russia should seek to give consistency and power, and material form to those ideas which must always be antagonistic to absolute rule; but it is vain to argue against the probability of a fact, when the fact itself stands bodily in evidence.

Here are the declarations voluntarily put forth to Europe uncalled for by any policy, carrying with them no particular benefit to the persons who thereby commit their own honor and the honor of the nations whom they represent to the good faith of the professions which they spontaneously make. Surely we shall not lay ourselves open to the imputation of weak credulity, if we stifle the instinctive suspicions that arise while we read these papers, and accept them with at least the hope that they mean all they say, not that the intentions of these two great powers are those they profess and no more, that when the Austrians have been driven from Italy the war will be stayed, the prize of contest will be won, and Italy will arise once more in unity, a nation of confederated constitutional States.

Beyond the unquenchable instinct of suspicion to which we have already alluded, there is really no reason why these good tidings should not be true, why these professions should not ripen into performances. It is the real interest both of France and Russia that Europe should be at peace. The glory of having resuscitated Italy would give a lustre to the name of Napoleon that would throw a doubt over the possibility of some earlier details of his history—military success would have consolidated his popularity with his army, and peace would restore confidence to his citizens, and prosperity to the industry of his Empire. He boasts that he can commune with the spirit of his age. If he be wise enough, and enlightened enough, and thoughtful enough, to comprehend the intelligences among which he lives, and to shape his acts in harmony with its tendencies, then this is precisely the policy which he would pursue.

It has a high and chivalrous character, and has at the same time all the advantage of the most humble expediency. It would astonish all men into applause. It would give to his name the renown of a great historic revival, and it would at the same time considerably increase the influence of France in the South of Europe, and aid her commercial interest on the great inland sea. As to Russia, the interests are quite evident, and are at this moment all on the side of peace.

Whatever may be her ulterior object, her present duty is to develop her own internal strength. She knows that she has wastes and wildernesses to win within her own frontier before she can hope to repeat with success her efforts at distant conquest. Public decency is another quality upon which we would place some confidence in the nineteenth century.

Even Emperors will be held to their public promises. Solemn declarations, made voluntarily to their brother sovereigns, cannot be treated as idle words uttered without meaning and broken without hesitation. It is more pleasing to search the policy of powerful nations for tokens of a rational and generous course of action, than to point out how a policy, based on meaner motives, would be certain to call millions of armed men into conflict, and to loosen all the foundations of civil order throughout Europe. If Russia and France honestly mean what they have so distinctly said, the Italian war will soon be at an end.

THE WASHINGTON CITY CHURCH.

To the Southern Preachers:

I DESIRE through the columns of the Advocate to return my most sincere thanks to those brethren in the ministry connected with the Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama Conferences, who have been so actively and zealously engaged in the sale of the "Methodist Pulpit South." I thank you, brethren, most heartily, and humbly trust that you may be still more successful in your future efforts. The work is a glorious one, and ought to be in the hands of every friend and admirer of the M. E. Church, South. Besides, it has been published for the benefit of a cause which cannot fail to commend itself to every patriotic and Christian heart. If we could get our brethren of the South to come to Washington and see for themselves the demand and necessity for the erection of an edifice worthy of Southern Methodism here at the Capital of the Union, we should not any longer have to appeal to you, by letter or otherwise, to aid us in accomplishing this great and most desireable object—an object and a desire most dear to my heart, and I am sure it should be equally dear to the heart of every true Southern Methodist. Would you have the position of the M. E. Church, South, understood and admired at the North as well as at the South, and would you, also, have those who visit our Capitol by thousands from Europe, to see her in her true light, and working under her true and unspotted colors? Then with a willing mind and liberal spirit, with a noble generosity and a zeal worthy of your profession, second my efforts, and heartily co-operate with me in the work of raising funds, and the object shall soon be accomplished. I am working not for myself, nor to gratify anything like personal pride, but I am working for the Church, for Southern Methodism, and for the glory of God. Help me, and co-operate with me for the sake of Christ and his glorious cause.

Allow me, dear brethren, to request you to send in the funds arising from the sale of my book as rapidly as you can. I have in the hands of those who are engaged in the sale of my book, copies amounting to about $12,000, and as I am dealing with poor mechanics principally in the publication of the work, I am obliged to pay the cash in most instances, hence you see the accumulating demand I have for money. And more than this, I am exceedingly anxious to commence at an early day the foundation of our contemplated Metropolitan Church. I trust that the day is not far distant when we shall be able to commence the work. WM. T. SMITHSON.

DR. L. PIERCE ON THE GENERAL RULE.

MR. EDITOR.—Have you read the views of Dr. Lovick Pierce on the General Rules, as published in some late numbers of the Nashville Advocate.

If I have rightly understood him, he holds that these "Rules" are, and ought to be, the scriptural tests of membership in the Church of God; and that the administration of Discipline would be simple and health-giving to the Church, if every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward.

Of so much importance does he regard these views, that he insists upon a called General Conference, to take under advisement the whole religious condition of the Church, without any tramel or hindrance from secularities.

In my humble judgement, a wiser suggestion has not been made in the nineteenth century. YOURS RESPECTFULLY, F. G. FERNSON.

STAMMERING.

IS SOMETIMES the result of habit or carelessness; at others it succeeds a long attack of sickness. It is a kind of St. Vitus dance of the tongue. Not unfrequently it is brought on by the harsh treatment, or the inveterate ill-nature of parents, teachers, or superiors, in habitually meeting those under them with threatenings, scolding, or fault-finding. We have met before now with a most miserable class of human, or, rather inhuman beings, who scarcely ever enter a room where are children, or servants, or dependents, without the expression of some disapprobation or complaint. This has very naturally the effect to confuse and intimidate a child, especially one of a highly-nervous or excitable temperament; while steadiness and composure are the very antipodes of stuttering, which is essentially the throwing out of too much nervous power, sending too much nervous influence to the muscles which are employed in speaking; the result is, a want of proper control of those muscles. Hence, whatever diminishes the nervous supply to those parts, whatever directs the nervous flow to some other part of the body, diminishes the stammering in the same proportion. This is the principle of cure in all cases, although we have never seen a reference to it by any writer. Some twenty years ago, the New York world was struck with dumb amazement at the instantaneous remedy for stammering, which was thrusting a knitting-needle through the tongue. But it cured only till the tongue got well, because while the tongue was sore from the barbarous operation, the extra nervous energy was expended in the instinctive effort to refrain from any other than careful movements of the tongue. The expedient of Demosthenes in speaking with little pebbles in his mouth, was in the same direction. One of the most inveterate stammerers in London, became possessed of a fancy that he would make a good actor. On his first appearance, the theatre was crowded in curiosity. During the whole play he did not mispronounce a single word, did not fail to utter distinctly a single syllable, because his mind was engaged in another effort, was excited in another direction, the extra nervous power found vent in another outlet—precisely as in the more recently-alleged accidental discovery of a lady, that reading and speaking in a whisper is no instantaneous remedy; because it requires an effort to whisper; the mind's attention is directed to the act of whispering, and not to the distinctness of utterance. We will venture the assertion, that no man ever stammered in "popping the question," nor a young lady halt out y-ye-ye-yes. Instinct itself, prompts a cure. After a long illness from an accident, our Robert, aged three years, suddenly began to stammer most vexatiously. His whole system was in a debilitated and irritable condition. He had never come in contact with a stammerer. And believing that scolding, or threats, or ridicule, would serve to fix the habit for life, which would have been a great misfortune, we made an attempt, without apparent effort, to divert his attention to some other thing than the stammering. For example, when he asked for any thing, he was told, "You if you ask for it plainly, you shall have it;" and he we were aware of it, we found him, whenever he tempted to ask for any thing, striking his little against his thigh as he stood before us, at the tion of every syllable; and by encouragement found the habit broken up in a few months. As it life-long calamity, to have a son or daughter grow stutterer, we trust these hints may be turned to cal account by those whom it may concern. else done at the time of uttering each syllable, the attention, gives two outlets to the extra nervous and the remedy is complete; make a mark, pull a turn a leaf, stamp the foot—any one of them will a cure in a reasonable time. INGENIOUS DIVING BELL.

FOR the purpose of descending to the bottoms of and carrying on works there with greater facility by the ordinary diving bell, the following apparatus been contrived. On the front of a dredging placed a large chamber, made of sheet iron, having form of an elongated hemispherical cup, twenty-nine inches in diameter, and sixteen feet three inches height. In the centre of the bottom of the vessel is a large opening which communicates with the and in it is placed vertically a large cylinder of iron, open at either extremity, and which can, by of grooves, be lowered to any depth that may quired. When it is desired to examine the bottom river, it suffices to lower the cylinder, and by air pump, a large quantity of compressed air is into the chamber. The water by that means is underneath the cylinder, until at length the bottom the river is left dry. The workmen can then inside the cylinder, and proceed with the work any difficulty.

For communicating from without with the there is provided an antechamber for persons to and out without allowing the compressed air to from the inner chamber. The doors of the inner ber are hermetically closed, by which means the compressed air is small, and is easily replaced. For purpose of opening the inner door, it is necessary a valve to allow a small quantity of air in the chamber to escape into the anteroom, to restore and make the pressure the same on both sides door. A similar contrivance is necessary in the door; but before the valve is opened in the outer care must be taken to close the inner door and There is also another contrivance for forming an connection between the vertical cylinder and chamber. LONG LAWSUITS.

THE British House of Lords has just given a in case of the heirs of Peter Thellusson, which has in litigation since 1797. It is one of the most noted cases of modern times, and has led to a statute, enacts that the power of devising property for pose of accumulation should be restrained in general 21 years after the death of the testator. If Peter Thellusson's wishes had been strictly carried out, the ty to be divided would have amounted to about hundred and fifty million dollars, but for sixty-one a series of chancery suits were instituted by various sons who hoped to grasp a portion of the immense lying idle and unenjoyed before them. Costs, energy on the part of the trustees, and other causes so affected the estate, that little, if any, more remained be divided than there was at the time of the testator death.

A London journal reports that the longest which ever took place in England, or, indeed, in part of the world, arose in a litigated question respecting certain possessions near Wotton-under-Edge, in the county of Gloucester, between the heirs of Thos. Albot, Esq., count Lisle, on the one part, and the heirs of Lord Berkeley on the other. The suit was instituted towards the end of the reign of Edward IV, and was still pending in the reign of James I, at which time a compromise took place between the parties—thus embracing a period of one hundred and twenty years.

WOMAN STILL MORE IMPORTANT.

OF the door of Temperance, it appears, after all, Woman holds the key! There is more cookery in principal than cold water—or, as an able English writer says, "people would be astonished if they saw the number of drunkards made by bad dinners, reconciled to had to the dram-bottle to supply the place of food or compensate disappointed appetite." Such is the common case with the working classes; and, in the upper classes, how many a man takes more than his share, allowance of wine, when he has been treated to a joint of roast meat, a beef-stake, as tough as the hide of a rhinoceros, or some meat boiled to rags! The cook is a sure and fast ally of intemperance. She is the cause of conjugal quarrels out of number, for the happy wife has always to bear the brunt of the ill-humor arising from baulked appetite. Thus Temperance Societies should use their influence that the elements of cookery should make part of the education of every girl. And, we repeat that associations for the suppression of drunkenness would render great practical service if they applied themselves to the improvements of cookery, and of raising against stimulants, and calling for impossible prohibitions. Stimulus is of more than one sort, the man who gets the stimulus of palatable and nutritive food does not feel the craving for the stimulus of alcohol. [Home Journal.

A REMARKABLE PROPERTY OF IRON.

IN THE year 1856, says an English paper, Mr. Mushet, an able chemist connected with the Royal Arsenal, discovered that it is an invariable rule with iron which has remained a considerable time under water, when reduced to small grains or an impalpable powder, to become hot, and ignite any substances with which it comes in contact. This he found by scraping some common metal from a gun, which ignited the paper containing it and hurt a hole in his pocket. The knowledge of this fact is of immense importance, as it may account for many spontaneous fires and explosions, the cause of which has not been traced. A piece of rusty iron brought in contact with a bale of cotton in a warehouse or on shipboard, may occasion extensive conflagration and the loss of many lives. It ought to be added, that the tendency of moistened particles of iron to ignite is disenvered by the great French chemist, Lemary, as far back as the year 1670.

THE NEW BRITISH MINISTRY.

IT APPEARS that on the resignation of the Derby ministry, Queen Victoria did not at first entrust Lord Palmerston with the formation of a new Ministry. A dispatch, giving news by steamship Bremen, says that Lord Granville was first summoned by the Queen, but could not form a Ministry. The Queen was afterwards satisfied by Lord Granville that the only obstacle to the formation of a Ministry was the union of Lords Palmerston and Russell. She sent for Palmerston, and had an interview with him, and then immediately sent for Russell. The latter agreed to serve under Lord Palmerston, but none other.

HUMAN DEPRAVITY.—Whoever thinks he can reconcile himself to God, has wrong notions of God, of himself of duty, of sin. Either he considers God only under a single idea of mercy, or he knows nothing of his great corruption, or contracts duty into a narrow pass, or fixes the guilt of sin at a low rate.

CAMP MEETING.

As the time for Camp-meetings is now drawing near, and the friends of God's people are employed upon the means of perpetuating this heaven-blessed institution; perhaps a few thoughts from one reared in a Camp-meeting land, will not be unacceptable or inappropriate.

A number of years ago, when I first witnessed the system adopted in Mississippi and Louisiana of camping, I prophesied that they would go down. Late years have verified the prediction; for they have now gone into comparative disuse. The spirit of the profession, and cause of their decline arises from the fewness of tenters, and the immense burdens upon these few in sustaining the whole encampment.

In the middle States, a Camp-meeting has only to be announced, and without special solicitation thereto, their will be one hundred to three hundred tenters; many of these large enough to accommodate scores of persons. The secret of all this is: the tenter is not expected to take care of his whole neighborhood; but only his particular friends and persons from a distance.

The remedy I propose is this: let persons build tents of moderate dimensions, so that it will neither oppress the tenter to supply his table, nor wholly occupy his time in providing for his guests. Many persons, who otherwise would rejoice to tent are prevented by seeing on Camp-grounds a few huge tents, and hearing the prodigious burdens of the tenters, on our old plan. When dozens and scores would be willing to fix up for their wives and families and their friends from a distance, a moderate sized or small tent, which would make it lighter upon them, and give them, their families and servants ample time to their religious services. Let no tent holder be burdened with the families of his own, immediate neighborhood, who are as able to tent as himself.

ANOTHER ITEM: Let all persons who cannot find it in their power or circumstances to tent, provide a covered wagon or two; supplying it with provisions and necessary articles of furniture, that so, and follow in their vehicles, and at the Camp ground take a little space, fix up a table, and turn their wagon to a tent. In this way scores of persons, instead of burdening regular tent holders, actually assist them by inviting to their own private table many who otherwise would have to go to the tents.

AGAIN: Let all persons living in the neighborhood, going to the Camp ground in their buggies and carriages to remain but one day, carry their own provisions, and eat them, as did the Jews at their yearly Camp-meeting—the feast of tents or tabernacles. This will greatly relieve tent holders, for there are many day visitors, and the visitors themselves will be put to no inconvenience thereby.

ONE MORE: Let no person take parlor furniture to Camp-meetings, nor prepare costly, sumptuous dishes. This should be a place to feast the soul—not the body; and to provide fine furniture and sumptuous fare on such occasions, argues bad taste, and a tendency to injure the spirituality of the meeting, and help to break them down altogether.

LASTLY: Let a field or two be opened near by for horses; but especially a large public lot, where horses can be kept at a moderate charge, and let not the tent-holder be taxed or troubled with them. The attendance of these rides, would greatly relieve tent-holders of their heavy burdens on such occasions; make the expenses lighter by a judicious division of them, and greatly promote the interest, continuence, and vitality of the Institution.

But above all things, let all persons go to the Camp-meeting praying to God for His blessing upon it and them; each believing himself bound in honor to assist in keeping good order, and praying, and believing, for a mighty outpouring of Hod's Spirit, in the conviction, conversion, and sanctification of hundreds and thousands of souls.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Good news to the Churches, yesterday (Sunday 26th June) was a cheering day in the Vicksburg Methodist Episcopal Church. By request, the doors of the Church were opened and four of our young ladies, intelligent, esteemed and beloved by large circles of friends, came deliberately forward and attached themselves to the Church. What a day, what a scene! Do angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth, and will not the Church rejoice to see intelligence, youth and beauty laid on the altar of God. Will not fervent prayer go up in their behalf to that Redeemer who claims the young as his special treasures.

W. P. B.

Brandon.—REV. WM. PRICE writes: "We commenced a two days meeting at Wesleyana, on Saturday before the third Sabbath in June. On Sabbath we administered the Sacrament to many of God's children. Methodists and Presbyterians, all met together around the table of our common Lord. Others would have met us there had it not been for their unbelieving rules of close communion. O, when will Close-communionists learn that "charity is the bond of perfectness." Our meeting increased in interest from its commencement. From Saturday morning until Wednesday night—the power of God was wonderfully displayed—sixteen penitent souls found the "pearl of great price." Sixteen whites joined the Church, and five colored. The most of those who professed religion were young men: God grant to make some of them ministers of the gospel. Brother John G. Deskin was with us one day and night—full of the missionary fire; Brother Cato Price, Baptist Minister, preached for us one day, and made some appropriate remarks in regard to Christian union. Judging from his sermon, we would not suppose him to be an "Old Land-Mark."

"Our Local brethren at Wesleyana labored effectually up to Wednesday night; having other appointments to attend to, we left the meeting in their hands, with many penitent souls enquiring "What must I do to be saved." Dear brother, permit me to say, if we do our duty we shall have a revival throughout the Mississippi Conference. When every other human effort fails, prayer will prevail with God."

Warren Circuit.—REV. P. E. THEEN writes: We closed on yesterday at Bethel, our second Quarterly Meeting for the circuit; we had a good time; some were happily converted to God; several joined the Church; and some young members, who had grown cold were blessed and revived; while many of the old and faithful members were made to rejoice aloud and praise God. Bro. L. Pierce, our P. E. was with us in good health, and was enabled by the spirit of God to preach Christ, and him crucified—to the edification of the church. We were also favored with a discourse from the Rev. G. K. Marshal of Vicksburg, in the conclusion of which, he was very happy and eloquent. Bro. W. Glass from Rollvar-circuit, was also with us; and, in the Spirit of his Master, labored with us some days. Bro. Cornell (my colleague) and I, were let to close the meeting, which we did with the understanding that we would have another meeting at the same place in September, and our prayer to Almighty God is that the glory of the latter meeting may be greater than the former.

Pray for us my dear Brother, in Christ.

June 30th 1859.

Starkville and Pierce's Chapel.—REV. J. J. MILLSAPS writes: "We have just closed our second Quarterly meeting at Starkville, which lasted seventeen days. The Lord was with us. Thirty-two whites were happily converted to God, and twenty-six—nineteen whites and seven blacks—were added to the Methodist Church. We are under many obligations to our brethren of the ministry who labored so faithfully with us in the meeting."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Eastern Shore.—REV. J. P. JONES writes: "The son's of Ethopia are not only stretching their hands for but are happy recipients of the unlimited and efficacious atonement of our common Lord. Many of them are becoming the sons of God. "I have been trying to point those in my Church to the lamb of God. Many of them, especially on Fish River, have turned their feet unto his testimonies, and by faith claimed Jesus as their only refuge, and found sweet peace in believing. Twenty or more have joined the Church. The interest is spreading and many more are inquiring. Most of them are from the Old North Carolina State. Their good masters are anxious that they should be instructed to worship the God of our Fathers.

"Sometimes their hearts break forth in anthems of praise to God. It would do your soul good to see their sympathy. They are God's poor—He knows their frame—their superstitious, notions, etc.—which seem foolish and vain to the world; yet, the sweet incense will rise as high if not higher from their offerings as from that of the more favored and learned.

"May God save all these sons and daughters of Ham. This is a hard country, sin doth much abound. O, that grace may much more abound!"

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Hungarians in the War.

There are some signs that the influence of the Hungarian leaders is already felt in the war. Of the 7000 prisoners taken, according to some estimates, at the battle of Magenta, a large number were Hungarians and Italians, many of whom were captured in whole regiments, who laid down their arms without any apparent necessity. They are deserters, rather than prisoners; and doubtless they have left many behind them in the Austrian ranks affected with their spirit. But should the war continue, the revolutionary element outside of Italy will soon begin to manifest itself with distinctness. Already a private letter from Turin of the 7th instant says that a Hungarian legion to revolutionize Hungary, is organizing there, and the writer adds, the proceeding is causing much uneasiness in all who hold moderate opinions. But when the embankments are crumbling, the waters will spread.

Humboldt's Library.

Mr. Wright, American Ambassador at the Court of Berlin, has offered fifty thousand thaler for the library left by Alexander Von Humboldt. It is not probable that under the pressure of the present times, he will meet with many, if any, competitors in Prussia or Germany. The inheritor of these literary treasures is the late valet of the deceased philosopher, who, from the nature of his circumstances, cannot be expected to wait any length of time for the realization of the bequest. Thus it is probable that the tools and implements, as it were, of the greatest mind-workman of modern Europe, will be removed to the United States.

The New Prime Minister and the Position of England.

In the recent debate in the British Parliament on the Queen's Speech, Lord Palmerston (now Prime Minister) arraigned the Government with terrible severity for its Austrian proclivities; and he avowed that it was perfectly plain that the government were under a delusion with respect to the intention of the different parties, or else they would not have talked of the dignified conduct of Austria or of the suspicious and equivocal conduct of Sardinia. His speech is a notable specimen of partisan warfare, and his side carried the day. Hence the significance of the result is, that public opinion in England will not sustain its government in siding with the enemies of Italian independence.

Honors to Gen. McMahon.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "The great honors conferred on Gen. McMahon, now a Marshal of France and Duke of Magenta, prove how great were the services he must have rendered and how terrible the danger from which he rescued the Imperial Guard. If it be true that the Emperor was actually in the midst of the Guard when almost surrounded by the Austrians, the force of the words attributed to the Empress—namely, that General McMahon had saved the army—will be fully and deeply felt."

Important to Shipmasters Entering French Ports.

Information has been received at the State Department from G. G. Fleuret, Esq., the United States Consul at Bordeaux, that official notice has been given "that every shipmaster entering a French port must signalize his arrival by hoisting a yellow flag; and that hereafter proceedings will be instituted, in pursuance of the law of March 3d, 1822, against those who shall not comply with the foregoing regulations.

A Blow at Galveston.

The Civilian, of the 22d inst., says:—There was a lively North-easter blowing this morning on the Bay. The schooner Davis, bound for Virginia Point, with a deck load of railroad iron on board, came in collision with the steamship Orizaba and Gen. Rusk; the only injury done was that sustained by the Davis, in splitting her mainsail and partly carrying away her rudder.

LOCAL.

Medical Department of the University of Louisiana.

The Dean of the Faculty, Dr. Thos. Hunt, has succinctly furnished a flattering report of the condition and prosperity of the school, from which we learn that at the session of 58-59 there were three hundred and thirty-three students, of which ninety-eight were graduates.

Aside from the well-known capabilities, care and attention of the various Professors, the student enjoys superior advantages for obtaining both a theoretical and practical knowledge of the healing art. An extensive museum is attached to the institution, consisting of "a collection of muscular preparations from the Academy of Anatomy, at Florence. They represent more than 350 dissections. The pathological department is enriched by models from England and France, which represent diseases of the eye, and diseases of the skin, and by a great number of specimens of urinary and biliary calculi, obtained from Dupuytron's Museum, at Paris, from the College of Surgeons, London, and from amongst ourselves."

The report says that the number of medical cases treated at the Charity Hospital last year was about 8850; surgical patients, 2690; special diseases of women and children, about 687; number of births, 123. Some 700 cases are usually in the wards of the Hospital.

When it is remembered that this immense caravansory of disease is thrown upon to professors who make daily visites to the wards accompanied by students, it will at once be apparent what practical results follow. The report justly declares that, "in this Hospital, we have in New Orleans a practical School of Medicine and Surgery, which will bear favorable comparison with St. Bartholomew's, of London, or Hotel Dieu of Paris. There is no great city in the world where the student visits every form of disease so unrestrictedly as in the Charity Hospital."

We have said this much to show what facilities are offered to medical students, in the attainment of that practical knowledge necessary to successful practice. The information gleaned at the bedside of hundreds of patients, where every form of disease manifests itself, and where the searcher after facts can examine for himself, see the professors prescribe, and listen to their remarks, is more useful to the young practitioner than a thousand theologies spun by Brown, Cullen, and the rest of the medical theorists. COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, July 4, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 2d inst.: With the advanced period of the season and the presence of but few of the parties who usually operate in our leading export staples, the week has passed without any movement of much consequence in the market generally, and also without any marked changes calling for special remark. The annual season of dullness is now fairly entered upon, and the transactions in all departments of our market must be comparatively limited until the arrivals of the new crops and the return of the usual operators.

On Monday morning European advices two days later were before the public, brought to New York by the steamer Bremen, from Southampton 13th ult. The Liverpool Cotton market was reported dull, without any material change in prices, and Consols have declined ¼ per cent. Advices still two days later, however received on Tuesday, reported a recovery of an ¼ per cent in Consols, and the Cotton market still unchanged. On Wednesday morning the Arabia's advices, still three days later, were before the public, reporting the week to have closed at an advance of an ⅛ in the Liverpool Cotton market, with sales for the week of 57,000 bales, and the closing quotations were ⅞d for Fair Orleans, and 6 15-16d for Middling ditto. The total stock at Liverpool was stated at 631,000 bales, of which 557,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester were favorable, there being an increased demand for goods and yarns with an advancing tendency in prices. In the Havre Cotton market there had been an advance of 1 franc during the week, the quotations being 106 francs for tres ordinaire and 102 francs for bas, with sales of 6500 bales, and leaving a stock of 96,200 bales. Consols were reported to have closed at a decline for the week of 1 per cent, the quotations being 92¾ to 92¾.

More or less rain has fallen nearly every day of the past week.

COTTON.—Our last report left the Cotton market almost wholly without movement, and the sales of Saturday, Monday and Tuesday, only reached an aggregate of some 1300 bales. On Wednesday morning the Arabia's advices were before the public, and being of a rather favorable tenor, more buyers came forward than for some time past, the sales reaching fully 4000 bales. On Thursday the sales were some 1000 bales, and on Friday 1200 bales were disposed of; making a total for the week of 7,500 bales. Total receipts of the week 1191, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,649,708 bales, against 1,513,868 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 17,866 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 1st inst. 49,361 bales. The range of prices having continued without any marked change from last week's quotation. The enquiry is still almost exclusively for the grades, ranging from Low Middling to Good Middling, while the stock unsold (now about 30,000 bales) consists mostly of the lower and better description.

To all Dealers with Southern Methodist Publishing-house.

To carry out fully the spirit and law of the last General Conference in reference to the sale and circulation of Books, and to accommodate as far as possible all our customers, we have carefully revised our Catalogue, and modified the prices of our publications. Our new Catalogue will be issued at no distant day. In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers Books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On Books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. McFERRIN, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicated.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

A child's Dream of Heaven.

"I dreamed," said little Ellen, "that I stood outside the gate of heaven and looked in. The gate was made all of precious stones, but I could see through it. I could see the city, and it was all pure gold. I saw angels playing on large harps, and I heard such singing as I never heard on earth. They were all singing the same words, but I could not tell what they were. As I was looking, God spoke to me. He asked me if I had a new heart? I told him that I did not know. He said: "If you have not, you cannot come in here, but if you will go back to earth and pray for it, you shall have one, and I will send you an angel and bring you up here."

"So I came back to earth and went into a closet; and as I was praying, an angel came and took me and put me to the side of his bosom, and dear sister Annie in the other and carried us up to Heaven. You don't know how sweetly we looked. We were just like two little flowers tucked in his bosom."

"When we came to the gate, an angel opened it for us and we went in. Before, when I heard the music, I thought I never could sing like that; but the moment I was in, I could sing as well as any of them. Angels were all the while coming, bringing little babies in their bosoms and the moment they were in, they would sing as loud and as sweet as the rest. I saw my mother, and she looked glorious and beautiful. She was sitting on a little stool covered with silver, playing on a harp and singing O, so sweetly! Grandmother, too, was there; and, O, Annie, her wrinkles were all gone! And she looked as young as you do; and her face shone, and she had on robes of white, too. I said: "Grand-mother, there was great weeping when you left earth." She said: 'Yes; but I would not like to go back.' I saw Jesus sitting on a throne, and angels worshipping him; and when I saw how bright and glorious everything was, I wished that I had never sinned."

I should like to ask the children who may read this, if they think a little heathen girl, in dreaming of Heaven, would have seen what Ellen did?

It was because she had read the Bible, and had stored her mind with that it says of that blessed world, that such beautiful scenes visited her in her sleep. It was there she learned that she never could enter it without a change of heart, and that such a change could never be obtained without prayer. It was there that she gained such views of the Saviour in Heaven, which made her wish that she had never sinned. How much do we owe to that precious book, which not only sheds its light so sweetly on all the troubles of our waking hours, but makes even the dark night bright around us with the glory of Heaven; for so "He giveth His beloved sleep."

[Tract Journal.]

Little Alice's Resolution.

Little Alice arose one bright May morning just as the sun was peering through the white curtains of her little chamber, and after offering a simple morning prayer from the depths of her happy heart, she easily prepared herself for the day. How beautiful the earth looked, all sparkling with dew-drops, and how merrily the birds sang in the tops of the apple trees! Alice's heart grew happier still as she looked out upon them, and listened to the sweet hymnings. All was astir in the yard below. The speckled hen bustled about her ten chickens, anxious to pick them up a breakfast of stray worms and bugs; while big Shanghai stood on a stone and poured forth a blast from his clarion, which might have awakened an army. Alice laughed at his pompous, ungainly figure, which seemed still more uncouth by contrast with the stately peacock, which just then swept down the carriage walk. It was, indeed, a lovely morning, and the little girl had arisen just in time to appreciate its beauties. It always makes us happier and better to sympathize with the lovely and beautiful in nature. It brings us nearer to God, the source of all true loveliness, and makes us love more dearly all the creatures he has made.

"I will see if I cannot do good to some one this day," said Alice. "I know I am only a little girl, but I feel sure I can do something;" and with this good resolution in her heart, she descended to the dining-room, just as the bell rang for family worship.

When breakfast was ready, the baby worried and cried, and would not sit on the carpet as usual, and amuse himself. Mother looked weary, and it was plain her head ached badly.

"Please let me take Willie, mother!" said Alice. "It would just as lief wait, and I know he will be quiet with me."

"I should be very glad if you could divert him, Alice; he is cutting his teeth, and has worried me all night. Poor little fellow!"

Alice borrowed Frank's marbles, and sat down, with baby on the carpet. The bright-hued balls pleased him, and he loved to roll them about with his little fat hands. His sister patiently gathered them up, when they rolled beyond his reach, and thus the meal-time passed. She did not envy her brother his warm breakfast; the thought of helping her dear, kind mother, was a hundred times more satisfactory. The influence of a good example is often contagious, and after breakfast, the usually careless whistling, Frank sat down and played with the baby, while Alice was eating.

She did not conclude now that she had done enough for one day, but after baby had drank his cup of new milk, she coaxed him to his cradle, giving him one of her gayest toys, and then sang a sweet lulling song, which presently soothed the weary, restless little one into a quiet refreshing slumber. It more than repaid her for all her trouble to hear her mother say, "dear Allie, you have helped me a great deal this morning; and your little brother will feel much better for a good sleep."

Just then grand'pa entered, leaning on his staff, and walking feebly, as he felt more than usually unwell that morning. Alice sprang to his side, and assisted him to cross the room, where his easy chair was placed beside his favorite window.

"I will bring you in your toast and tea, grand'pa, as soon as Margaret makes them," she said cheerily.

"Thank you, my child, but I do not care much for them; my appetite is quite poor to-day."

"Just try a little," she added, as she passed out into the kitchen. She returned presently, with a nicely laid tray, and placing it before him, she broke the egg into his cup, and poured out a cup of fragrant tea, chatting pleasantly all the while. The old man's heart warmed, as he listened to her sunny cheering words. The breakfast was eaten with a relish he did not anticipate, and his wearied frame was refreshed and invigorated.

And thus she passed her day, going about with a sunny face, doing good to every one. Not even the old cat and the chickens were left outside her efforts and sympathies. When she went to rest that night, her heart was full of gladness, and with a thankful spirit she renewed her good resolution for the coming day.

Who of my little readers will form the same, and then carry it out as faithfully as did little Alice?

Friday.

It is strange enough, that Friday is regarded in all countries as a peculiar day. In England it is generally considered unlucky; many people will not commence any undertaking on that day; and most sailors believe that the vessel is sure to be wrecked that sails on a Friday. If a marriage takes place on that day, the old wives shake their heads, and predict all kinds of misfortunes to the bride and bride-groom. Nay, they even pity all children who are so unlucky as to be born on a Friday. In Germany, on the contrary, Friday is considered a lucky day for weddings, commencing new undertakings, or other memorable events; and the reason of this superstition is said to be the ancient belief, that the witches and sorcerers held their weekly meeting on this day; and of course, while they were amusing themselves with dancing, and riding on broomsticks round the Blocksberg, they could have no time to work any evil. And by all sensible people Friday is regarded no better and no worse than any other of the six.

DEATH OF A BELOVED ONE.

Died in Mobile, June 12th, 1859, Mrs. Kate Lowber, wife of H. M. Neill, in the 27th year of her age.

The removal of this beloved one from the sphere of her love and labors, strikes us at first as an event so premature as to awaken those deep regrets we shed over the death of one in whom expanded hope had centered, and on whom the enchanting light of promise for future usefulness rested.

But life is not measured by years. "That life is long that answers life's great end." The departed had attained to the full stature—beautiful in the grace and symmetry of a noble Christian womanhood. Gifted with a superior mind and earnest nature, she was ever a being breathing "thoughtful breath;" from six years of age she evinced a religious sensibility and conscientiousness most extraordinary. Reared in the "nurture of the Lord," by one who well supplied the place of a devoted Christian mother, she became early enlightened and elevated by a knowledge and love of Christianity—thus developing a worth and beauty of character, the memory of which will ever serve to make our faith in goodness strong. Never very strong—she yet accomplished much; and her life affords a striking instance of how much may be achieved in the midst of weakness and want of bodily resources, where there is purity of aim, "high faith and a brave heart."

She was known to the readers of the Advocate, some years ago, by her graceful "Letters from Abroad." A facile and elegant pen did she wield; and had she chosen, to exert her talents in this direction she might have been widely known as a most pleasing writer, but she had no wish to shine beyond the sacred precincts of home—where her affections, happiness, and hopes, were clustered.

Through all the stages of a protracted illness she clung to life, to her husband and two little ones, with fondest tenacity—and was severely tried at the thought of separation from them; but, towards the last, she was enabled to surrender herself and loved ones into the hands of her Heavenly Father. For some days before the final hour came, the bitterness of death was passed—and the "smile of her heroic cheer floated above all floods of earthly agonies." She spoke of her death with great composure, even brightness; and left this sweet message for one who, though present, could not hear her almost inaudible whisper. "Tell Aunt Mary I am happy, and willing to depart. My trust is in the Savior! and He is with me every moment." With little conflict, and none of the mortal agony, she dropped to "sleep in Jesus" in the early morning of a beautiful Sabbath day.

May the bereaved be able to trace her flight beyond the portal we call death, and though their conceptions be clouded by mortality, yet may they feel that she has become a link between their human hearts and heaven.

A FRIEND.

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

CONTENTMENT.

How beautiful and lovely is this quality, where possessed to any considerable extent. Like a gentle and lovely Queen, it dispenses peace and happiness to all by whom it is possessed. It gives a holy calm, a quiet spirit, which is independent of all worldly surroundings—such as wealth, honor, fame, pomp, or superiority over the general race of men.

Who does not covet such a quality? Many a wealthy man—such as the world looked upon as peculiarly blest, and envied by his friends; one who can command untold riches; at whose nod a hundred slaves tremble, and whose every wish is granted ere it is fully expressed; many such, I say, would give the whole of their vast possessions for the sweet boon of contentment, which all their wealth has failed to secure to them.

How happy must be the man, who, under any circumstances in which he is placed, can say with truth—"I am content with my lot." Surely such an one, be he rich or poor, is to be envied. No lot, however lowly, is despised by him. Though he does not scorn the most lowly condition, yet can he grace with ease the highest worldly position; and in either extreme, he preserves a medium of conduct: In the one he is cheerful, and agreeable, and in the other, not haughty nor overbearing toward those, his inferiors in station. How important then that we should possess this priceless gem. It is worth more to us than houses, lands, or untold wealth; for "a contented mind, is a continual feast," as a "well-spring of happiness," always pouring out its riches with lavish prodigality, yet never exhausted. BLANCH BERNARD.

Waverly Institute, Texas, June 16th, 1859.

RIDING ON HORSEBACK BY LADIES.

Riding on horseback is a useful as well as graceful means of exercise, too much neglected by young ladies. A canter for a few miles is a most admirable promoter of female beauty and health. The cheeks, the eyes, the lips, and every feature of the fair equestrian, when sha diamounts, possess that fresh and sparkling grace which is one of the most important requisites in female loveliness, and which can be imparted only by the purity of the blood and its brisk and equal circulation, which are produced by temperance and exercise. The pale, sickly, and languid countenance of that lady whose hours of leisure have been passed without occupation within her chamber, or in listlessly lounging upon a sofa or couch, may present attractions to such as have selected their standard of beauty from among the victims of a round of fashionable dissipation; but every man of sense and genuine taste will prefer the ruddy glow of health, the active agile step, and exuberant gaiety of her, who is accustomed to spend some time every fair day in active exercise, on foot or on horseback, in the open air.

But, though riding on horseback ranks in the first class of exercises, it is nevertheless an art which those who are unskilled in can never sufficiently appreciate, or truly enjoy,—and it is very evident, that the greater portion of those ladies who indulge in it, labor under this advantage. In no other art, probably, are there so many self-taught amateurs; numbers of ladies have a decided objection to go through the ordeal of a riding-school, others do not reside where they can obtain the benefit of a master's instruction,—and the generality consider that they are in possession of all that can be acquired on the subject. It may be remarked, however, for the benefit of all, that, whatever else may be known or wanting, nothing can be more detrimental to the grace of a lady's appearance on horseback, than a bad position. The young lady who aspires to be a good rider, should, from the first, strive to obtain a proper deportment on the saddle. She ought to be correct, without seeming stiff or formal; and easy, without appearing slovenly.

FAMILY RELATIONS OF THE CZAR AND THE EMPEROR.

It is a fact which is not generally known, that the families of the Czar of Russia and the Emperor of France are connected by marriage. A son of Eugene Beauharnais, who was married to the daughter of the King of Bavaria, married a sister of the present Emperor Alexander of Russia. Eugene was the son of the Empress Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon. One of her grand-sons is the present Emperor of France. Another is the husband of the sister of the Emperor of Russia. One of her grand-daughters, by Eugene, is the present Queen of Sweden. Another grand-son, who is now dead, married the Queen of Portugal. Still another grand-daughter by Eugene, is the Empress of Brazil.

Obituaries.

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

ELIJAH SIMMONS, was born on the 10th day of December, 1815, and died in Whistler, Mobile county, Alabama, on the 22d day of February, 1859. At the time of his departure he was, and had been for many years, a consistent member of the M. E. Church; but, more especially for three years before his decease, he seemed to live for God and for heaven. All his thoughts and aspirations were bending for the heavenly world, and may be expressed in the celebrated words of the immortal Wesley, "I want to find my way to heaven; I want to land safely upon that happy shore." In his last illness he said—"I feel like a balloon oscillating in the air, waiting for the messenger to cut the last cord; that borne away upon heaven's breezes, I may rise to the purer and more glorious regions above. In intellect he was strong; in judgment, sound and discreet. His friendships were warm, ardent and noble. As a son of the Church he was a strong and efficient supporter of our itinerant system and of all her institutions. He was a thorough Methodist of the old type, and was justly regarded as a strong moral power in the Church of God. Godly in examples and holy in life, his influence in the world was ever for God and for good. His death was just what might have been expected—calm, peaceful, and full of triumph. A christian widow and three children are left to mourn his absence from earth, and to rejoice that his happy and pure spirit is forever garnered in the skies.

THO. J. CARVER.

MRS. E. W., wife of the Rev. N. B. Ralford, departed this life June 14th, 1859, in the 62nd year of her age; she was the daughter of Mr. Samuel Elliot and Margaret his wife; was born in Maryland, May 3d, 1798; her early life was spent in Maryland; but, when about eight or ten years old, her father moved to Nashville, Tennessee, and from thence down the Mississippi river to somewhere near Opelousas; and from there to Covington, Louisiana. She was always a Methodist in principle, but did not join the Church till 1833. She lived a consistent member until June 28th, 1856; when, owing to some difficulty in the Church, she withdrew, took her letter, and never returned it. She suffered much, and complained but little, even until death. One day and night before her death she appeared to have lost her mind and speech, and knew nothing until an hour or two before death, when she rather came to herself and threw her arms around the neck of her husband, and embraced him—as much as to say, meet me in heaven.

Chinn Grove, Mississippi, June 20th, 1859. J. H. PACKWOOD.

A TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO REV. GASTON S. WOOD.

WHEREAS, The members of the second Quarterly Conference for Gaston circuit, Alabama Conference, held at Tampkinsville, May 21, 1859, have been informed that Rev. Daniel S. Wood, a Local Preacher on this circuit, departed this life in the triumph of faith, on the 14th ult., aged sixty-two years and seven months, therefore:

Resolved, That we have heard with feelings of deep sorrow of the decease of one so useful, so pious, so experienced as our aged Bro. Wood. He has been exercising his ministerial office for about twenty-seven years. For many years past he has lived upon this circuit—and, the savor of his upright walk and zealous labors among us still lives, and shall live in our hearts while memory lasts.

Resolved, That we truly sympathize with the children of our deceased brother. Two weeks before his death, their mother was taken away—the stroke was a heavy one—but let us how in submission to this inscrutable Providence, knowing that the judge of all the earth will do right.

Resolved, That a copy of this action of our body be sent to the family of the deceased and to the New Orleans Advocate for publication.

JONAH BARKER, Presiding Elder.
S. HALL, Secretary.

Gaston Circuit, Alabama Conference, June 20th 1859.

MRS. SARAH RUSH, was born in Lincoln county, Georgia, January 25, 1794, and died May 3, 1859. Her life was a long one, not only in years but in action, and valuable for its worth and weight. She was twice married—in 1821, to Timothy Walton, and in 1827, to Charles G. Rush. The latter preceded her to heaven only a brief season. These devoted ones pursued their pilgrimage together, blessing and being blessed, for many years. This Christian woman died as she had lived—confiding in God. She was ardently attached to the Church—taking an interest in everything pertaining to its prosperity; prompt in the path of duty; a lover of class-meetings, and a pattern of Christian character—her triumph at the close of her career was complete. The last six months were spent in submissive waiting for the angel of death: they were months of peace—peace, which flowed like a river. The supreme moment having arrived, she cheerfully put off the mortal, and entered on rest—in heaven. She was a model mother: may her children follow in her steps. Her death occurred at her residence near Tuskegee, Alabama. J. M.

BERTIE NORWOOD, infant daughter of Thomas F. and Mary E. Collins, died in East Feliciana, Louisiana, June 14th, 1859, aged 16 months; also, LILLON, infant daughter of the above-named, died July 1st, 1857, aged about one year.

Jesus said, "Suffer little children to come to me, and forbid them not: for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

These lovely lands so young and fair,
Called hence by early doom,
Just came to show how sweet the flowers
In Paradise will bloom.

May the parents who are called to weep, so live, that they all may meet on the shores of Eternal life. E. A. FLOWERS.

SISTER ELIZABETH ANN HUGHES, daughter of James H. and Eliza J. Gullion and consort of James C. Hughes, departed this life—the second of May, 1859, after an illness of one week. Sister Hughes joined the Church in the winter of 1855; lived a consistent member; was loved most by those who knew her best. She seemed perfectly resigned to God's will, believing that Christ's Holy Spirit would illumine her path through the valley of death. The highest compliment a parent can pay a child is, that it has been obedient and affectionate, Sister Lizzie's parent's earnestly believe that she merits this remembrance. Her Pastor. O. P. WESTMORELAND.

Oakland, June 28th.

ALICE CLEMENTINE, youngest child of John A. and Ann J. Leckey, died on the morning of the 10th inst. Her death was sudden, on the evening of the previous day she was playful and cheerful, but ere the sun again arose, her sweet spirit had taken its flight to the resting place above. HER FATHER.

MRS. SUSAN SPENCER, consort of William Spencer, died in Hamburg, Perry county, on Sabbath morning, 19th of June. Mrs. Spencer had been a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for a number of years past, her daily walk, was that, of one truly devoted to God.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint to the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, indigestion or Dyspepsia, inflamation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhoea or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Chlorosis or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Mr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by my Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but my invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold.
Very respectfully yours,
O. E. BRYANS.

Children,
TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. "All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.
[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a family fireside.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 18 months, was quite unwell; from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.
Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharges to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the eldest) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSER.

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.
B. T. HEIMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

We Dont Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivaled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and ever will it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would not this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of the kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

THE HERE AND THERE OF A BIBLE AGENT.

Marion—The Methodist Parsonage—Schools—Demopolis—Kilty—Sickness—The Mansion of—Fish Pond—Southern University—Livingston—Success of the Bible Cause—A Friend of the Preacher, etc., etc.

MARION, Perry county, was the point where I began my operations after leaving home on the 6th May. I stopped with Brother Jno. Myatt, in whose kind family I spent some ten or fifteen days several years ago, assisting the Rev. T. Y. Ramsey in a very gracious revival. The fruit of which is seen to this day.

The second Sabbath, I preached in the Methodist Church, and found a cheerful and liberal response to a call for the support of the Bible Cause. The pastor of the Church, Rev. F. W. Dorman, concluded the service with an appeal in behalf of the Bible, which added largely to the contributions cast into the treasury of the Lord. The collection reached about $160. Considering the large amount paid by some of the brethren toward our Book Depository, and the heavy expense of the station, this was a very commendable contribution. The parsonage of the Methodist Church in Marion is a new and pleasant one, and the present occupant has managed as he only can manage to have it elegantly furnished. Persons in and out of the Church gave different pieces of furniture; the chairs are not broken and rickety; the tables not two-legged and split in pieces; the carpets not one or two-ply, and half worn-out and but half large enough; the cups and saucers are not of every variety, and not enough of any kind; the knives and forks are not, part without handles, and worn down to great thieness and point. No: things about that domicil looks refreshing, and indicate the desire of the people to make their pastor and his family as comfortable as themselves. Marion is a thriving place; its schools have been its pride. It would be a matter of curiosity to have the statistics of the male and female youth educated there, from first to last. The Howard College, the Judson Female Institute, and the Female College, under the Presidency of Rev. J. K. Armstrong, are all flourishing.

DEMOPOLIS.

After leaving Marion, I sat out for Demopolis, but tarried a few days at Arcola, under the hospitable roof of my old friend Alfred Hatch. He and his kind wife are known from North Carolina to Alabama as the friends of the preacher. More than one of us know, that when stationed in G., how the vegetables, and mutton, and poultry, and other conveniences for the kitchen and table and palate, would every now and then come in. Sometimes we would conclude, surely this is too good to last long; but no, it continued to hold out until the new preacher came, and still went on. Several ministers of us remember Kilty, the preacher's pony. She was always at their and their children's service. She was a great favorite, for she was gentle, safe, and sensible. Bro. H. informed me that she lived to a great age, and closed her earthly pilgrimage amid tender nursing. He says, that often, when the other horses were severe in their treatment of her, she would run to the house for protection. Peace be to her ashes.

I enjoyed a ride with Bro. H. over his plantation; which is rich, extensive, and well cultivated. He took me over a portion of it which he called Egypt; which lies low, and which is every few years overflowed with the high waters, but instead of being injured, it is rather benefited by the rich deposit which is left. I doubt not but what much of this land will yield a bale of cotton to the acre. I was surprised and delighted at the fine crops of red clover growing on the plantations in Green, Percy, and Marengo counties—especially in the Limestone Lands. It promises to be very remunerative in furnishing pastures, and hay for stock.

On the third Sabbath of May, I preached in Demopolis. I was pleased to find many familiar faces, having once been stationed there. The Bible Cause has friends in Demopolis, who in different ways contributed about $150.

While engaged in conducting the religious services in the forenoon, I was taken ill, and repaired to the house of Bro. Benjamin Glover. He was from home, and his wife quite sick, yet I received every attention that could have been asked or desired. My physician, Dr. Ruffin, watched over me carefully eight days, while the servants, who were skilful nurses, were ever at hand to meet my demands.

Dr. Harmon, the stationed minister of the Methodist Church, engaged actively in the organization of a Bible Society in Demopolis—which has projected large plans for usefulness.

From Demopolis I went home sick; where I was compelled to remain more than a month. But I have reason to thank God for afflictions, for although like medicine they are not pleasant, yet are often beneficial. Few people grow in grace in the midst of prosperity, and few reach heaven through it.

GREENSBOROUGH.

This was the first point at which I began my labors after leaving home. On the third Sabbath evening in June, in the Methodist Church, I made an appeal in behalf of the Bible—and asked contributions for its circulation; Brothers Gideon, Nelson, and John Walton, gave $30 each; Bro. Thomas Johnson, $10; and others, $10 or less. Raised in Greensborough, publicly and privately $139.

I spent a pleasant time with the kind family of my friend, Dr. Thomas Webb. Seldom have I been more kindly entertained than at Greensborough. I served the Methodist Church here as its pastor in the years 1849 and 1850; which I look back upon as among two of the most pleasant years of my ministry. There are in the Church here some as noble Christian gentlemen and women as can be found anywhere.

While in Greenville I visited the mansion of Brother J. Nelson, which, when finished, will cost it is thought from seventy-five to a hundred thousand dollars. There is a large centre building, with two smaller buildings on each side extending to between two and three hundred feet. The door and window facings of the front of the noble building are made of the common China wood, which has been smartly dressed and varnished, without a particle of paint; and which, for beautiful flnish and richness of color, is unsurpassed by any wood I have ever seen. The frescoing, the selections of paintings, the arrangement of the rooms, make his place one of rare attraction. It should be added, that with all these creature comforts and worldly conveniences, he is proverbial for his liberality to the Church and its enterprises.

I cannot forget the pleasant visit I made to the family of Brother J. Walter, with whom I spent a portion of my time. In company with himself wife and others, I went to see his fish-pond—which is large and beautiful. We carried with us a new and elegant skiff, which for the first time was introduced to the water and put to service. The old servant who superintends the premises said, that in launching it, we ought to have broken a bottle of wine over it, to christen it. But it turned out that we were there without wine, either for christening or drinking purposes—and yet we spent the day very pleasantly.

While in Greenville, I examined the building of the Southern University. It is handsome, substantial and commodious; and will accomodate a large number of students. The building is about finished and paid for. Leaving the endowment fund near $250,000. This institution will afford superior educational advantages, for it has a fine faculty and thorough course of instruction. Every Methodist, yea, every Christian, should rejoice at the prospect of its usefulness.

It has been suggested that it would be a good idea to turn this Institution over to the General Conference, and let it become the one grand University of the Methodist Church, South; and let the East Alabama Male College be recognized as exclusively the College of the Alabama Conference. Schemes, more utopian in their appearance than this, have been carried out.

LIVINGSTON.

On the fourth Sabbath of June, I had the pleasure of preaching in the Methodist Church to a large congregation. Our Presbyterian brethren were with us and entered heartily into the support of the great cause I advocate. The Bible collection at Livingston, taking all things into the account, is the best I have taken up. It is about $31[illegible],00.

When the begging part of the sermon came on, I discovered no wincing, no wry-faces—no hanging down of the head, no looking out of the windows or doors, as if to say, I wish I was away, or, had not come to Church to-day. The occasion was to me exceedingly pleasant, because the congregation seemed pleasant and said by their looks, this is our cause as well as yours. The Livingston Bible Society made a donation of $150,00, to the Parent Society—reserving the balance to furnish its own county. A colporteur is to be immediately employed and put to work.

At Livingston, to my surprise and delight, I met with my good old friend, John Parker, who subscribed $30 towards the circulation of the Holy Bible. He has a neat residence near Livingston, where he and his amiable companion are passing a pleasant old age. Having known him long and intimately, I am prepared to say that I have formed the acquaintance of no one who is a truer friend to a Methodist Preacher. More than once he has been known to furnish them and their families with his horses and carriage and driver, to make trips of a considerable distance. Riding with him the other day in his buggy, says he, "How do you expect to go to such a place?" I replied, "I calculate to hire a conveyance." He answered "you can take my horse and buggy, and I will send a boy with you."

This horse and buggy, Mr. Editor, was put unasked at my service, when I arrived at Livingston, to use at my pleasure. Paul in his itinaries was helped on his way by the Saints, and here, in my own case, is an example of similar assistance.

Brother Parker appeared to me to love money less, and yet has gathered about him as many real comforts as any one with whom I am acquainted. The best of all is, he keeps ready to leave all, and to go to his better inheritance in the skies.

I formed the acquaintance of Bros. Sturdevant, Cobbs, and other generous and whole-soul Christians, who made my stay here profitable and pleasant.

But not the least among the pleasant remembrances of Livingston, was my association with the Rev. T. C. Wier and his wife, who is, as you know, a daughter of Col. Robt. A. Baker, who not only gives himself and his money to the service of the Church, but his children. Brother Wier is getting a strong hold upon the affections of his people, although he is the successor of a popular predecessor. May the Lord signally bless his ministry to the good of all who attend upon it.

A VISIT TO THE W. W. SABBATH-SCHOOL OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

I FOUND the school under good management—order and decorum prevailed in every department; the teachers exhibited an air of earnestness and close application to their work; the officers appeared to be diligent and systematic in their movements; the children, with sparkling eyes and smiling faces told, in unmistakable language, that they were happy, and loved the school and their teachers.

The superintendent, who bears strong marks of physignomy, that leading traits in his character are benevolence, kindness, and a warm Christian heart. He loves the cause and loves his work.

The singing was soul-stirring—the prayers fervent, and in faith. Indeed every thing about the West Ward Sabbathschool, is highly gratifying to its managers and friends.

From some cause or other, the school at the opening of the present year had been reduced to but a few scholars and a limited number of teachers.

Our Missionary movements in the department of our Sabbathschool operations, brought on the zeal and energy of our West Ward brothers, and they now have the gratification of numbering one hundred and twenty-seven scholars, twelve teachers and three officers, making one hundred and forty-two connected with their school, and all of these zealous in the work. They have a respectable library and are using means to enlarge it.

I hold, that Sabbath-schools and Temperance are the practical bulwarks of the Church and the liberties of our country. LINCOLN.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH AT WASHINGTON.

MR. EDITOR: It has been suggested that I had better say something more, in reference to the Washington Church. Well, it is a worthy, needy object for charity. I have been promised about $100. I will say to the friends, that the Church, with their help, shall be paid out of debt. If the, spontaneous charities, of the friends of Methodism do not meet the debt, I will D. V. go in search of means until they are in sufficiency obtained. My work however, is in need of my continual labors. Let us have the means brethren, if you please, I know that you can. B. F. WHITE.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS ASSOCIATION.

AMONG the religious associations of Germany the Gustavus Adolphus Association for founding and supporting Protestant congregations in Catholic countries is now by far the most extended. Its receipts rose last year to the amount of 101,733 thalers, a sum largely exceeding the receipts of any other German religious society. On the distribution of this sum among rising or poor Protestant congregations, we find in the Gustavus Adolphus Almanac for 1857, the following statement, which shows at a glance the wide extent of the operations of the Association. In Africa two congregations received 1707 thalers; in America, two congregations 123 thalers; in Belgium, thirteen congregations 961 thalers; in Germany, two hundred and forty-two congregations 58,798 thalers; in France, thirteen congregations 3687 thalers; in Holland, four congregations 325 thalers; in Italy, one congregation 300 thalers; in Austria, seventy-three congregations 24,605 thalers; in Prussian Poland, twenty-three congregations 2943 thalers; in Portugal, one congregation 700 thalers; in the Danubian Provinces of Turkey, five congregations 2134 thalers; altogether three hundred and eighty congregations, 101,733 thalers.

In England the increasing importance of the Gustavus Adolphus Association is duly appreciated, and the leading men of the Evangelical Alliance have repeatedly expressed a wish to see the English societies for similar purposes enter into a closer connection with it. The Roman Catholics of Germany are disconsolate at its success, for their counter Association of St. Boniface never sees its receipts rise above 30,000 thalers. They try all means to arrest its progress. In the Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, a Protestant state, a Catholic State attorney has brought suit against the editor of the Gustavus Adolphus Almanac, Rev. Mr. Ritter, for having knowingly published in his almanac false news and rumors in order to incite hatred against the Catholic Church. Though it was shown by the defense that the articles specified were taken from works which circulated freely even in the Catholic States of Germany, Mr. Ritter was sentenced to two months imprisonment.

RATIONALISM IN SWITZERLAND.

ACCORDING to an article of the New Evangelical Church Gazette, the Rationalistic party in Switzerland is greatly on the increase, especially in Zurich. The first attempts to organize those sympathizing with Strauss and the Tubingen school into a compact party, were not successful. The appointment of Strauss as Professor of Dogmatic Theology, called forth a revolution of the people, in consequence of which he had to resign before having entered upon his office. A paper of the same tendency, Die Kirche der Gegenwart, (The Church of the Present Age,) had to be discontinued after a very brief existence. In the meetings of the Protestant clergy of Zurich, and of Switzerland in general, they were without influence. More recently, however, they have increased in number, and many members of the party have advanced, under the patronage of the Grand Council of the Canton, into the most influential places in the Church. Encouraged by the consciousness of their strength, they have again taken up the offensive war against the orthodox party. In a meeting of the Ascetic Society, the oldest among the religious societies of Zurich, on June 9, 1858, they attacked foreign missions in general, and in particular the way in which they were undertaken by the missionary societies. At the Cantonal Synod, held on Nov. 16th and 17th, the annual report, which was read by Dean Locher, gave a gloomy picture of the condition of the State Church. He complained in particular that the negative-critical theology of Tubingen was even taught in the three higher classes of the Gymnasium by Prof. Biedermann. The latter admitted the facts with which the report charged him to be true, but claimed for himself and for every member of the State Church the right to interpret the Bible in the way he understood it. His views were supported by a host of friends, mostly young men, some of whom are said to be very talented. The Synod considered itself either incompetent, or unable to take any resolution with regard to this subject. The Rationalistic party is therefore full of hope, which has recently been again increased by the departure of one of the leading men in the Evangelical party, Professor Schlottman, from Zurich. Almost all the other members of the theological faculty of Zurich are Rationalists; one, Professor Schweizer, being an assistant editor of the central organ of the Rationalistic party in Germany, the Protestantische Kirchenzeitung; and another, Dr. Volkmar, entertaining on the essence and origin of Christianity nearly the same views as Dr. Strauss. Not so numerous, but equally active are the Rationalists at Basel. Here the exclusion of a Rationalist, Mr. Rumpf, from the ranks of the clergy, gave rise to a motion in the Grand Council, that the vows which the clergymen of Basel have to take at their ordination be so changed as to secure to the Rationalistic party the undisturbed right of admission to the ministry. The motion was defeated by 72 noes against 27 ayes. In order to effect a closer organization of the party throughout Switzerland, a meeting of liberal clergymen of the cantons of Aargan, Zurich, Basel country, and Berne was called for March 7th at Olten, where also the establishment of a Rationalistic Church Gazette of Switzerland was to be taken into consideration.

BITS OF PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

THE passages that follow, are from the recent debates on the Address, in the British House of Parliament.

In the first Speech, delivered by Her Majesty, at the commencement of the last session, one of the principal topics touched upon was Parliamentary reform. In the Speech in which Her Majesty dissolved the last Parliament, if I remember rightly, the principal topic of the words placed in Her Majesty's mouth amounted to an invocation to Divine Providence to give a majority to the present Government. It must, however, be admitted that the Government have not played the part of the waggoner in the fable, and contented themselves with prayers alone, but they have applied their Governmental shoulders most energetically to the wheel. In the Speech which has been delivered to-day no reference is made as to whether this prayer has or has not been granted, but the noble lord who last spoke has intimated that the noble earl opposite, (Lord Derby) is at the head of a large majority in this House, and that he will be supported by the votes of 300 members in the other House of Parliament.—EARL GRANVILLE.

The paragraph in the prorogation Speech, which appears to have given greatest offence to my noble friend is this: "Her Majesty prays that, under the blessing of Divine Providence, the step which she is about to take may have the effect of facilitating the discharge of her high functions, and enable her to conduct the Government of the country under the advice of Ministers possessing the confidence of Parliament." The gloss which my noble friend puts on that is Her Majesty prays that the effect of the dissolution may be to give the present Government a majority. Now, in 1857 there was a somewhat similar dissolution at a time of year not very different, in consequence of the Government having been put into a minority. The language then put into Her Majesty's mouth by the Governments of Lord Palmerston I find is much more profane than anything which the noble lord has quoted from the speech for which we are responsible. It runs thus: Her Majesty commands us to assure you that it is her fervent prayer that the several constituencies of the United Kingdom upon whom devolves the exercise of these high functions may be guided by an all-wise Providence to the selection of representatives whose wisdom and patriotism may aid Her Majesty in her constant endeavor to maintain the honor of the country." Let us contrast the two Speeches and see to which of them the charge of profaneness applies. Lord Palmerston makes Her Majesty pray that the people may be guided to the selection of representatives who will aid her in upholding the honor and dignity of the country. But recollect the appeal to the country was based on the ground that Parliament had not assisted Her Majesty in her endeavours to maintain the dignity of the country. But in the prorogation speech to which my noble friend has alluded, what Her Majesty prays is that the step which she is about to take may enable her to conduct the government of the country under the advice of Ministers possessed of the confidence of Parliament."—EARL DERBY.

My noble and learned friend opposite, Lord Brougham also, I think, referred to the subject in alluding to the memorable attempt to effect a combination between Pitt and Fox. I was, I must say, somewhat struck by the singular coincidence suggested by the remarks of my noble and learned friend, which tend to prove that the sacrifices which were made by the statesmen of former times, are not without parallel at the present day. In 1804, Pitt said Fox behaved like an angel. Now, what was the angelic virtue which called forth this expression of approbation? It was the acceptance on the part of Fox of a mission to Vienna. These great men were two rival statesmen. They could not both have held the foremost part in the Government. It was therefore agreed that one should accept the inferior post of Minister at Vienna, and the acceptance of that post was held to be the act of an angel. If I remember rightly, the noble lord, the member for London, is equally entitled with Fox to the praise of having done an angelic act; but I never heard that the noble lord the member for Tiverton had the generosity to say that in his opinion his noble colleague had behaved like an angel. Indeed, I believe the noble viscount seriously and sincerely rejoiced at the self-sacrifice of his noble friend; nor can I help thinking that he rejoiced quite as sincerely when he found that the result of his negotiations in Vienna did not tend very materially to increase his noble friend's political reputation. But I understood that a meeting of reconciliation has taken place, at which those two noble lords were present, and perhaps my noble and learned friend would still further assist the work of peace by suggesting which of them should upon a second occasion undertake an angelic mission.—EARL DERBY.

I state, in a manner the most unequivocal and unequivocating, that there has been no compact of that kind, and that the support that was given in many instances to the members on this side of the House, at the late general election, by our fellow-subjects professing the Roman Catholic faith, was given, not only without compact and without conditions, but was given without even communication with Her Majesty's Government. And I take it for granted that those who supported us under these circumstances, as the other subjects of Her Majesty, had formed their own fair opinion, right or wrong, on public men and on public policy. But it seems that the civil and religious liberty granted to the Roman Catholics, especially with the aid of the noble lord, means civil and religious liberty to vote for Whigs and to support Whig candidates. The moment a British or Irish subject professing the Roman Catholic religion votes for a Tory, it is quite clear that gentlemen opposite meditate again the revival even of those penal laws, for the repeal of which they assume so much credit to themselves. MR. DISRAELI.

They should have withdrawn their objectionable Reform Bill, and brought in another, framed on principles which the debates in this House had clearly shown to be in harmony with the general opinion of Parliament. If they had done this, and produced such a Bill, my belief is that it would have passed, and would at this very moment have been the law of the land. But it was reported of them that they said they had done that before, and could not repeat a course which they had once ventured upon. Why, they have made two mistakes. What they refused to do a second time was to correct the mistake, and put themselves right. To be twice in the wrong they had no objection; but to be twice in the right was repugnant to their feelings. It was said that I taunted them—that I bade them withdraw their Bill and bring in another, and that they would not do my bidding. Why, sir, are they men or children? It might be a very good argument for a naughty child, when told to do a thing, to say "I won't, because you have told me to do it;" but for men, for the statesmen of a great country dealing with an important question, to say they will not do what is right, because, forsooth, one of their opponents told them to do it, in a manner which they, perhaps, did not like, is either too jocose or too serious, I know not which.—LORD PALMERSTON.

The House has been entertained during many nights of this debate by gentlemen's descriptions of one another, and the conclusion to which I have come, Sir, is that neither party deserves a good character.—MR. ROEBUCK.

DR. WINDSHIP, THE STRONG MAN OF BOSTON.

A CORRESPONDENT of a New York paper thus writes under date of Boston, June 13th:

Dr. George B. Windship, of Roxbury, has created quite a furore in our city, by delivering in the Musical Hall, on Wednesday evening last, a lecture on "Physical Culture," which he illustrated by feats of most wonderful and amazing physical strength, which he has acquired by a persistent and regular course of exercise. Dr. Windship is a young man of not more than twenty-five years of age, about five feet seven inches in height, and weighs about one hundred and forty pounds, with an exceedingly fair face, and modest and retiring manner. He graduated at Harvard College some four years ago, since which he has studied medicine, and had the advantage of considerable private practice in some of our most respectable families, as well as the practical information gained by a connection with several of our hospitals and public institutions. His lecture abounded in practical common-sense and philosophical reasoning; showing unmistakably, that while the physical education has been cared for, the intellectual had not been neglected, but that, also, had been strengthened, vitalized, and made more vigorous.

At the conclusion of the lecture, Doctor Windship illustrated the force and truth of his theory, by lifting with his own hands, unaided by any straps or machinery, except such as nature had provided him, eight hundred and twenty-six pounds; he then lifted, in the same way, nine hundred and twenty-nine pounds! He then shouldered a barrel of flour weighing two hundred and sixteen pounds. Afterward he exercised a hundred pound dumbbell in each hand, with the same apparent ease that a man of common and ordinary strength would handle those weighing fifteen or twenty pounds. He then raised himself up by his little finger some four feet from the stage, and in this way continued to sustain his bodily weight three or four minutes. This was accomplished by attaching a strap to a pole, which was sustained by two men holding it on their shoulders. All this was done with apparent ease. The lecture, as well as the illustrations, was received with the wildest enthusiasm of applause, by an audience of over two thousand of the most intelligent men and women of our metropolis, and among them were nearly all the members of the medical faculty, as well as large deputations from men of science, literature, and members of the legal profession, besides the professors and students of Harvard College; many of the teachers and pupils from the different schools in our city were also present. Doctor Windship has been requested by a large number of our scientific and literary men to repeat it, with the illustrations, which he will do.

A Boston paper gives the following sketch of a portion of Dr. Windship's address:

Dr. Windship gave an account of his own experience in gymnastics, commencing with his seventeenth year at college, where in two years his health was greatly improved. Gymnasiums, he showed, had their abuses from persons not properly trained trying to outdo others. Exhaustion and weariness should never be allowed to come. Lifting was a neglected branch, on account of the tendency of people to injure themselves with it. Yet, to a thorough hardening of the whole body, lifting was necessary. He had commenced with five hundred pounds, and increased gradually, till on the 12th of May past he had lifted nine hundred and twenty-six pounds.

Galen had calculated that the hips and legs could support two or three tuns. There were other ways of lifting by which large amounts could be lifted. Not long since, with his hands and back together, he had lifted fifteen hundred pounds. There was a vast difference between lifting and sustaining. He would not advise any one to train themselves up to lift over five hundred pounds with the hands, or two thousand with the straps. He had gone beyond that to ascertain what could be done. Totten and the Belgian giant were the only persons he had ever learned authentically to have lifted eight hundred pounds. Totten lived one hundred years ago, and was thirty years old when he lifted it. Dr. Windship said he had five years yet to that, and he hoped to train himself to lift sixteen hundred pounds clear.

Next to lifting, dumb-bells were useful. One of his own weighed one hundred and forty-one pounds, and others one hundred pounds each. The rings came next. He had never practiced over half an hour a day, all that was sufficient to exercise all the muscels. He was five feet seven inches high, and weighed one hundred and fifty-three pounds. In reference to practicing, he would say, try no feat twice on the same day, if it was found to tire or exhaust in the slightest degree.

MY LADY CRUMP.

SHE was a little, plain, spare woman with hardly an ounce of flesh about her; with pale, feeble-looking hair, and weak eyes, that never could have perpetrated a flash or a twinkle in their whole existence. Her complexion was wan and indefinite, for she seemed not to have blood enough in her body for one good wholesome blush. Her hands were long, pale and feeble; not possessing character enough to look like claws; but flabby and cold enough for fungus. Her voice was a ghost; not from want of power, but from absence of spirit and tone. She always dressed in dingy greys or faded greens, and worn silks that did not make a grand rustle, but that feebly hissed and shivered, like dump, dead leaves blowing about. Her outward appearance was a faithful sign of her inward character. She was a dreary melancholy creature, that lived in her beautiful house like an owl in sunshine. She never appreciated the comforts she possessed, but was always craving for something either beyond her reach, or that, which when obtained, lost its charm. In fact, she was the living and concentrated essence of disconteat. The mood of the silly princess, who longed for the roc's egg to complete her otherwise perfect palace, was my Lady Crump's normal mental condition. She had been an only child, and became a spoiled one. Every wish was anticipated, every want was met by her parents; so that she never knew the luxury of making a wholesome wish, and then healthily toiling to obtain it. She was in point of riches a sort of Miss Kilmansegg; and, like that renowned lady, her natural tastes and aspirations became perverted and eccentric. Her whole existance was one dissatisfied longing after what was beyond her reach, as a sickly plant in a cellar is drawn in distorted fashion to the light. All her servants and retainers have been duly and rigidly trained not to thwart her, nor cross her in any way, so that had she exclaimed she wished she had the moon, they would have uttered in chorus, "I wish you had, my Lady Crump."

As it was, not a day passed that she did not wish for something unreasonable. One day it would be for the robust health of Phœbe Budd, the milkmaid; another day she wished she had such a lover as Rogers, the handsome young blacksmith; an idea that would have created mortal terror and dismay in said Rogers' mind, had he known it. One week she would saunter about, envying Betty Brood, her numerous tribe of wild black-eyed children, the pest and dread of a whole parish. The ensuing week she would murmur and repine that Heaven had not made her a man, to be able to win glory and scars in the wars of the time.

Her charitable impulses were so feeble and uncertain that she would stare vacantly out of her coach window on a poor, shivering, half-starved beggar, and, after leaving him crouched up miles behind on the bleak road, would mutter dolefully:

"I wish I had given that poor man something."

"I wish you had, my Lady Crump," would earnestly say her kind-hearted chaplain. Many angels visited her unawares, but my Lady Crump entertained them not, and they spread their wings and went to more humble but more cheerful hosts.

When the summer came, with its roses and lilies, and wreathed the old manor-house with a living garland of fragrance and bloom, and the birds twittered and sang the whole day long, my Lady Crump had her chair taken to a dark, cool corner of the stately room, and would fretfully say:—

"I wish we had done with the hot summer weather."

"I wish we had, my Lady Crump," the starched old butler would answer gravely.

And when the lake was one sheet of ice, and the cedar was hung with glittering drops, while sheets of white snow covered the lawn like an ermine mantle, my Lady Cramp would muffle herself up to her nose in costly furs and velvets. She had her easy chair wheeled almost into the great fire of logs, that went roaring half way up the huge chimney, and said dolefully:—

"I wish we had the summer back again."

"I wish we had, my Lady Crump," would be sure to come from some one or other.

And she lived on, day by day, moaning and pining, never satisfied, till her life drew near to its close. During her last lingering illness, her incessant weak cry was:—

"I wish I had my health again."

And it was as dexterously responded to as ever by physician and nurse:—

"I wish you had my Lady Crump."

And then Phœbe Budd, going up to the housekeeper's room to be paid for some needle work, saw the large sunny window darkened, and knew that my Lady Crump lay a dying. And she told Roger so, as they both trudged merrily to the fair, to lay out their long hoarded savings in furniture, ready for their wedding; long wished for and toiled for, early and late, and now coming at last. They both said mechanically, "Poor Lady Crump!" and then went on to wonder if her heir would let them rent the new cottage or no. And my Lady Crump, lying in her darkened room, with all the scenes of death, heard the distant sound of their merry voices, as they went down the elm avenue she was to see no more.

"I wish I were in their place!" she faintly sighed.

"I wish you were, my Lady Crump," said her starched gentlewoman.

Then my Lady Crump lay long after this in a kind of dream, and the pleasant summer hours flow on till the warm light of the setting sun lay bright and golden on the rich green boughs of the cedar hard by. The loud notes of a bird, singing nearer the casement than usual, aroused my Lady Crump so that she moved her thin hand wearily on the silken counterpane.

"I wish it was night," she moaned, turning her dim eyes from the warm golden rays that lay in long lines over her bed.

"I wish it was, my—" half uttered the gentlewoman, stopped by a look of pain and horror on the chaplain's face, as he stood gazing quietly on the wasted features before him. For he knew that Night was coming—almost come—with great black shadowy wings clouding over a few gleams of the past—a night that was to know no waking.

Again her lips moved, and he bent over her to catch the words.

"I wish I had my life to live over again."

"I wish you had, my Lady Crump," fervently and solemnly ejaculated the chaplain.

And so she died.

And thus arose the proverb; so that, whenever any one is unreasonable or discontented, and reiterates dolefully, "I wish I had such, or such a thing!" he is silenced by the rejoinder in chorus, of all within hearing, "I wish you had, my Lady Crump!"—Household Words.

PRONUNCIATORY.

WE HAVE seldom seen a happier thing than the following, for which credit is due the Albany Evening Journal.

A Chapter on Pronouncing the nomes of Places at the Seat of War.—On the 29th of April, the Austrians crossed the river Ticino (Te-chee-no.) They at Pavia (Pa-vee-a) and Beregnardo (Ba-ra-gwar-do) would have crossed at Buffalora (Boof-fa-lo-ra) had they not found the bridge blown up. They occupied the towns of Novara (No-vah-ra,) Vigovano (Ve-jay-va-no,) Pallanza (Hallan-za,) Romagnano (Roman-yah no,) and Vercelli (Ver-chol-lee,) establishing their headquarters, first at Robbio (Rob-be-o) and afterward at Mortara (Mor-tah-ra.) They fortified themselves on the banks of the river Scsia (Se-se-a) and as far North as the Lago Maggiore (Lah-go Mad-jo-ra.) They pushed their reconnoitering parties as far West as Stroppiana (Strop-pe-ah-na and Santhia (San-te-a,) and Southward as far as San Giorgio (San Jor-jo) and Voghera (Vo-gay-ra,) having crossed the Po at Cornale (Cor-nah-la) and menaced Tortona (Vor-to-na.) At Frassinetto (Fras-se-net-to) they had a skirmish with the Sardinians, at Pontecurone (Pon-ta Coo-ro-na) they blew up a railway bridge, and at Valenza (Vah-len-zah destroyed another. So much for the troops of Count Gyulla (Joo-li.)

Meanwhile the French, crossing the Alps, came pouring down from Mont Cenis (Mon Seh-nee) into Suza, (Soosa) and pushing forward to join the Sardinians at Turin, which they call Turino (To-ree-no,) whence the allied troops advanced to fortify the banks of the Dora Baltea (Dora Bal-tay-a.)

The other division of the French, and the Emperor Napoleon himself, landed at Genoa (in Italian, Ge-no-va) and proceded North by railway to Novi (Novee,) where they joined the Sardinian column, whose headquarters were at the impregnable fortress of Alessandria (Alessan-dre-a,) and who also hold the fortified town of Casale (Ca-sah-la.) The king and the emperor have met, established their temporary headquarters at Occimiano (Otche-me-ah-no,) whence they can easily communicate with their respective commanders—General La Marmora (Lamarmora) and Marshal Canrobert (Cann-ro-bair.)

HEARING WITH THE TEETH.

LAY A watch upon a table, glass side downwards, then stand so far from it that you cannot in the ordinary way hear the ticking. Now place one end of a small stick, say about six feet long, upon the back of the watch, and grip the teeth to the other; with the fingers close each ear to exclude all external noise, the beat of the watch will then be as audible as if placed against the ear. All other sounds can be conveyed in the same manner, no matter how long the stick be; for instance, if one end be put upon a pianoforte in a sitting room fronting a garden, and the stick be thirty feet long, extending outside the window on to a lawn, if the instrament be ever so lightly played, "the tune" will be instantly distinguished by any person applying the teeth to the opposite end of the stick.

Again, if a light bar of iron or any other metal be suspended by a thick string held between the teeth, and then struck with any hard substance; the sound will appear greater than by hearing with the ears.

LUMBER FOR THE HOLY LAND.

COMMERCE makes curious changes, and places the products of the earth in strange places. We have a schooner the Forest Belle, Capt. Percival, now loading with lumber in our port and destined for Beirout, one of the seaports of Syria in Asia. Who would have supposed that, in the course of human events, the pine forests of Georgia would contribute lumber to rebuild upon the ruins of Baalbek, to modernize the ancient city of Damascus, both of which are in the vicinity of Beirout; or to frame anew the domes and palaces of the Holy City? Yet time in its wonderful revolutions, has made it a living reality, and in future days the Georgian who shall make his pilgrimage in that distant land, can mingle the associations of his own home with the sacred memories of a soil that was trodden by the Saviour of mankind. The cargo of the Forest Belle, is the first that has been shipped in that trade, and we trust that the success of the experiment may be such as to encourage additional exportations. A POTENTATE.

A LATE circumstance shows a certain style of power in Europe, the kin of which may be found elsewhere. Austria gave orders to provincial magistrates to enforce the Papal rule lately made, preventing Christian domestics from serving Jewish families. One evening a Jewish capitalist at Frankford, called a meeting of his brethren, and they refused any longer to negotiate Austrian paper. Soon no German, and then no Parisian Jew would "do" any Austrian paper or loan on Austrian securities. A panic began. Baron James Rothschild, of Paris, telegraphed immediately to his nephew at Vienna, to wait upon the Government, and remonstrate against the rule: The rule was at once revoked, and soon after, Baron James, whom no European Monarch dare treat slightingly, went to Vienna, and talked the matter over warmly with the Emperor. The Emperor assured him that he himself knew nothing whatever of the rule! But the Jewish money-men have conquered.

WHAT A GOOD PERIODICAL MAY DO.

SHOW us an intelligent family of boys and girls, and we shall show you a family where newspapers and periodicals are plentiful. Nobody who has been without these silent private tutors can know their educating power for good or evil. Have you never thought of the innumerable topics of discussion which they suggest at the breakfast table, the important public measures with which, thus early, our children become familiarly acquainted; great philantrophic questions of the day, to which unconsciously their attention is awakened, and the general spirit of intelligence which is evoked by these quiet visitors? Anything that makes home pleasant cheerful and chatty, thins the haunt of vice, and the thousand and one avenues of temptation, should certainly be regarded, when we consider its influence on the minds of the young, as a great moral and social blessing.—Emerson.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JULY 13, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

LIFE AT THREE-SCORE.

Views of a Christian Man Sixty Years Old—with which Old Men are invited to compare their Views of Life, and Young Men are encouraged to Hope and be Strong. Is the World growing Better or Worse?

"Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom."

An eminent minister of God—Albert Barnes—lately preached a sermon to his people on his sixtieth birth-day, which, without being egotistical, derives instruction from personal experience and observation. A man who has reached that time of life ought to be able to give some views of living worth the attention of those starting on the way. The discourse shows that a cheerful view of life may be taken by a man who has come near to its last stage, and who can expect little more from earth; that such a man may feel that there is much that is worth living for, even when he has a near prospect of a better life; that is is not necessary that one who is growing old should feel that the world is becoming worse, or that all the plans for its improvement have failed.

Any young man has a right to ask a man of sixty, How life seems to him now? How has the reality been, as compared with the anticipation? How does the world appear now, as contrasted with the vision which rose before the mind of the boy when he formed his plans for future years? Has the world been what it promised? Or, are those visions all illusory and vain? What is there, as seen by a man of sixty, which is worth living for?

Our old man who has consented to be questioned, answers favorably:

"The first thing I have to say is, that I have found all, and more than all, that I had hoped; all, and more than all that it promised. In other words, I have now a higher idea of life as such—of the desirableness of living—than I had at the outset. It seems to me to be a greater matter by far to live, and to carry out the real purposes of life, than it did when I began my course.

"I mean by this, that there is more that enters into the idea of living—of living in this world. It is a greater matter. It is a more desirable thing. There are more things to be accomplished; more to interest the mind, to win the heart, to impart happiness; more to make it a serious matter to leave the world." The world has grown upon him, not as a theatre of ambitious action or sordid acquisition, but for higher purposes and contemplations. The mere love of an old home, or the disinclination to be disturbed or moved from an accustomed place, which is characteristic of aged tenants, is not the cause of his attachment to it. Let him explain himself.

"When, therefore, I spoke of the world as more desirable to live in than it seemed to me at the beginning, I meant the world as such—as a part of the universe of God—as a place where He is developing his great plans; and when I speak of life as seeming more desirable to me now than ever before, I refer to it in reference to the great objects for which it was given, and to what may be done in securing those objects.

"This is a different world from what it was sixty years ago. The universe, if I may so express it, is larger than it was then; the earth is more ancient and more grand. Every sixty years of the earth's history, except perhaps the period of the dark ages, has made the world different; but no period of sixty years has made so great a change as that to which I now refer. The universe to human view is conceivably more extended, there is not a science whose boundries have not been greatly enlarged. Many of the most important discoveries in science and inventions in the art, which are to be developed in their influence on following ages, have started into being in groups and clusters. Worlds and systems have been brought into view unknown to man before."

The world above is greater. Astronomers have been exploring it and bringing new orbs to our sight and system. The world beneath is greater. The microscope, as the telescope, was indeed known sixty years ago, but its wonderful revelations were just then beginning to be made.

Steam, in its various applications to commercial, social and domestic life; the railroad and the magnetic telegraph, make this a different world from what it was sixty years ago. The moral world has been moving too. Hear the witness: then thank God and take courage.

"The great enterprise of Christian benevolence, yet to result in the entire conversion of the world to God, had been originated in that time. The Bible was indeed in men's hands, and the gospel was preached, and the power of the press was known, but the serious thought had scarcely found its way into the minds of the friends of the Saviour of bringing the combined influence of these agencies on the widest scale possible to bear on the unconverted portions of the race. Within the period of which I am now speaking, this thought has taken a firm possession of the Christian mind and heart, and the great work of the world's conversion has been entered on in earnest. The Bible has been translated into nearly all the languages of the world; the strongholds of the earth have been occupied by missionary stations; millions of children are taught the great truth of Christianity from week to week in Sabbath-schools; and a Christian literature is spreading its influence far and near over nominally Christian and Pagan lands."

Well might the seer, though his eyes are dim, exclaim: "I see a different, a larger world than it was when I began to live." And his conclusion and lingering look at the scenes in which he has borne a good part, but soon must quit, we can understand: "I hope much in reference to the future. I see that the next age is likely to be more fruitful of great results than even this has been; that it will be an age in which it will be more desirable to live than this has been. I look now on the beginning of things; on the commencement of developments which are to be far more grand and glorious than any which we have seen."

A man at three-score must have views of that future world, for which this is a scene of preparation, such as time only can give. Until we know them by experience, we must learn of him. We have his testimony. Mr. Barnes illustrates the magnitude of eternal things as one approaches the end of life, compared with those which ordinarily occupy the attention of mankind, by a beautiful figure:

"The importance of this life as a season of probation steadily increases as we come in sight of the end, and see a vast eternity not far before us. The interests at stake grow larger and larger. Those things which ordinarily occupy the attention of mankind, dwindle almost to nothing. The earth, as it moves in its orbit from year to year, maintains its distance of ninety-five millions of miles from the sun; and the sun, except when seen through a hazy atmosphere, at its rising or its setting, seems at all times to be of the same magnitude—to human view an object always small as compared with our own world. But suppose the earth should leave its orbit and make its way in a direct line towards the sun: how soon would the sun seem to enlarge its dimension! How vast and bright would it become! How soon would it fill the whole field of vision, and all on earth dwindle to nothing! So human life now appears to me. In earlier years, eternity appeared distant and small in importance. But at the period of life which I have now reached, it seems to me as if the earth had left the orbit of its annual movements, and was making a rapid and direct flight to the sun. The objects of eternity, towards which I am moving, rapidly enlarge themselves. They have become overpoweringly bright and grand. They fill the whole field of vision, and the earth, with all which is the common object of human ambition and pursuit, is vanishing away!"

Mr. Barnes began life a skeptic, and after his conversion was diverted from the bar to the pulpit. He had been eminently temperate in his habits, and an advocate of the temperance cause, which it gives him pleasure to think of now. Besides preaching and pastoral labors, he has written acceptable commentaries on portions of the Bible.

"All my commentaries on the Scriptures," he says, "have been written before nine o'clock in the morning. At the very begining, now more than thirty years ago, I adopted a resolution to stop writing on these Notes when the clock struck nine. This resolution I have invariably adhered to, not unfrequently finishing my morning task in the midst of a paragraph, and sometimes even in the midst of a sentence."

Those morning hours, when, with God's word in hand, he prevented the dawning of the morning, were the times he gathered manna. "I knew of no part of my studies from which I have derived more real aid in my public ministrations, than from the habit thus early formed, and so long persevered in, of beginning each day with the study of the word of God."

Beginning life as a skeptic, having the mind and leisure and the learning to investigate the subject, and actually devoting himself as a pastor and commentator to it, what is his final conviction about Christianity?

"I can have no object in being deceived, or deceiving others; I have as much personal interest as any other man can have in the question whether Christianity is true or false. I say now, therefore, that I am more firmly and more intelligently convinced of the truth of the Bible than I was at twenty-one years of age; that the difficulties which I then saw have been silently and gradually melting away; and that I now perceive scarcely any which I do not see existing with equal force in the analogy of nature, or which are not such as lie beyond the powers of man as yet developed, and which properly pertain to another world."

Only a Christian witness could give such a cheering testimony of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come. The worldling is disgusted, the debauchee exhausted, the ambitious and scheming are disappointed with life. In their own failures they think everything else has failed. With no hope in God, and little faith in men, their prophecies are gloomy. Selfish in their aims and narrow in their views, the enlarged prospect of blessing and progress, under the reign of God, is shut out from their eyes. It is a blessing to live in this nineteenth century. It is a privilege to have a part in and be witness of what is going on in the world, and to enjoy such opportunities of glorifying God and preparing for heaven. With thanks for his dispositions, let us dismiss Three-score from the witness-stand, with a brief summing up:

"Permit me to say that I am, at this period of my life, hopeful in regard to the world, to truth, to religion, to liberty, to the advancement of the race. The world is growing better; not worse. It is better now than it was sixty years ago; it is becoming better every year, every month, every day. In its progress society takes hold of all that is valuable, or that constitutes real improvement, and will not let it die. That which is worthless is superseded by that which is useful; that which is injurious and wrong is dropped by the way; that which goes permanently into the good order of the world, alone is retained. There is more love of truth than there was sixty years ago; there is more science; there are more of the comforts of life; there is more freedom; there is more religion. There will be more in the next age than there is now; and so on to the end of time. Christianity never had so firm a hold on the intelligent faith of mankind as it has now. It will have a firmer hold on the next age, and will extend its triumphs until the world—the whole world—shall be converted to the Savior." [Nashville Christian Advocate.

GATHER THEM IN.

Many, said a speaker at a prayer meeting, think it is no use to invite the children of Roman Catholic parents to go into a Protestant Sunday-school. There never was a greater mistake. They are not only willing, but glad to have them go. And often their going is of unspeakable good to their parents. Let me give one illustration.

Away in the West lived a Roman Catholic family, in which there was a little girl seven years old. She was induced to go to a Protestant Sunday-school. The father became very anxious about his soul. His distress increased daily, and one night, at the midnight hour, he arose from his bed in agony. He begged his wife to pray for himself. She told him she "could not pray—no better than he could."

"What shall I do, then?

"Perhaps," said she, "our little Mary can pray."

So the father went up to her chamber, where she was fast asleep, and took her up from her bed in his arms, and bore her down stairs, and putting her gently down, he said to her, with great earnestness.

"Mary can you pray?"

"O yes, father, I can pray."

"Will you kneel down and pray for your poor father?"

"Yes, I will pray for you."

So she kneeled, put up her little hands, and said, "Our Father who art in heaven"—going through with the Lord's Prayer. Then she prayed for her father in her own language, asking God to love him, and have mercy upon him, and to pardon all his sins for Jesus Christ's sake.

When she had finished her prayer, her father said to her, "Mary, can you read in your Bible?"

"O yes, father, I can read. Shall I read to you in my Bible?"

"Yes, read to me."

She began at the third chapter of the gospel according to St. John. She read along till she came to that verse—

"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."

"O Mary," said he, "is that there?"

"Yes father, it is here. Jesus Christ said so."

"Well, that is just what I need—what your poor father needs."

"Yes, father, and hear the rest of it—

"For God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whomsoever believeth in him, should not perish, but have everlasting life."

"O! that is for me—for just such as me; whosoever believeth in Him. I can believe in Him—I do believe in Him."

And from that hour that father went on his way rejoicing in Christ Jesus with great joy.

So gather in the children—all children—into the Sunday-schools of all classes—from all conditions.

"FORGIVENESS" AGAIN.

Ms. Editor:—In the Advocate of the 8th inst., over the name of Thomas S. Abernethy, I find something, that claims to be an answer to the point in my article, published the 11th of May last.

In this—Mr. Abernethy places me on several corner points that my position neither expresses nor implies. And then, after a sharp philological contest between the words as and for, and actually comparing Matt. vi. 12; with Luke xi. 4, he converts an adverb into a copulative conjunction; and, in the scuffle, kicks up a sort of metaphysical mist, in which he buries the subject almost out of deep.

But haply for Mr. A., he gives only his "opinion;" and draws that "opinion" from a stock of premises, that is composed of one supposition, one imagination, seven ifs and two presumptions—all of his own. From this foggy stand-point, he admits that God's moral government under the gospel, forbids Him to bestow forgiveness on a sinner until he asks for it; but affirms, that man, under this same gospel law, is bound to bestow forgiveness whether the offender desires it or not. The cutest argument he offers in support of this, is the difficulty in seeing how a man can be in possession of a forgiving spirit, and not bestow it on or transfer it to the offender. He can readily see how God can be full of this spirit, and not bestow it until the sinner asks for it. But, when man is brought under the gospel law, God takes possession—reigns in and rules over him—the same unchangeable God in the heart; that He is in heaven; all at once Mr. A.'s perception is befogged in uncertainty; he gets up a discussion at the altar—his Scotch metaphysicism is puzzled—the doctrine becomes vague and unsound, and the law of God's mercy requires man to do more than it can possibly allow God himself to do!! No marvel that such divinity should suggest a doctor—for it is certainly ailing, if not very ill.

But just here, I wish to insert your position more fully. I do this that I may be more clearly understood. And if it should appear that Mr. Abernethy pours a broadside at you while he attempts to defend you, it will only be more light—to which you will not object.

In yours, of December 15th, 1858, the following attracted my attention.

First. "He who withholds forgiveness, and refuses to bestow it on an offender until he is asked for it, is cherishing the malignant spirit of infernal hatred." This I denied.

Second. "God loves all, and forgives all; and we ought to bestow forgiveness on all, whether the offender desires it or not." (?)

Nothing is more obvious, than that you gave this alleged act of God as the reason why we should bestow forgiveness whether the offender desire it or not. Thus, placing the law of our duty, in what God does. And, though Mr. A. may say nothing about the undefiled Universalism that might be distilled from your position, yet, he is down on you for placing the law of our duty in bestowing forgiveness on the same principle on which God bestows it. He says, "the law of our duty is found in what God directs us to do." But where did God direct us to bestow forgiveness on an offender, whether he desired it or not? Just nowhere at all.

Our standard lexicographers say that as is an adverb; and make it give the idea of like unto, or, in like manner. But Mr. A. converts it into a copulative connection, and makes it give the cause or reason why God should bestow forgiveness on us. I was taught to give the Savior's DEATH as the CAUSE or REASON why God should forgive, or bestow forgiveness on me; and not anything that I had done. But could Mr. A. not turn his philological apparatus, and so change the points of his battery as to convert the conjunction into the adverb? Then, there would be no "conflict." Let him try it: and the experiment may reveal to him that an adverb of comparison is never used to give the reason or cause of an action.

"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." God's will is done in heaven; and here we are taught to pray for it to be done on earth—as like unto or in like manner.

"If any man have a quarrel, against any, as Christ forgave you, so also do ye." Col. iii. 13. Christ forgave you—bestowed forgiveness on you, when you repented and asked for it. So also do ye bestow forgiveness, as, in like manner.

Again. Be kind—forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. Eph. iv. 32. God for Christ's sake forgives you when you ask, and ask aright, and now you are to be kind, and bestow forgiveness, even as, equal, in like manner. Here St. Paul places the law of our duty in bestowing forgiveness, in what God for Christ's sake does. And the Saviour does the same thing in Matt. 5th chapter, to which Mr. A. refers us.

Here we are instructed how to treat the common enemies of our common religion. Not to hate, but to love and be kind unto them; so far as to feed them when they are hungry and give them drink when they are thirsty. Rom. xii. 20. The Saviour immediately gives the reason why. "For He (God) maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. We are to love and be kind to our enemies because God loves and is kind unto them. And though this has no direct allusion to the treatment of an offending brother, the Saviour unmistakably places the expressed "law of our duty in what God does." And, therefore, if love and kindness to a common enemy necessarily involves the notion that man is to bestow forgiveness whether the offender desires it or not, it also involves the notion, that God bestows forgiveness on his enemies whether they desire it or not. For what He does in this case, is pointed to both as the example and law of our duty.

But the law of our duty towards an offending brother, is given in Matt. xviii. and Luke xvii. In Matt. xviii., commencing with the 15th verse, we are taught how personal offences between brethren are to be treated. "If thy brother trespass against thee, go to him and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. This is a personal matter, "If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." Or, as St. Luke has it, thou shalt forgive him, if he repent. And if he (thy brother) sin against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn unto thee, saying I repent; thou shalt forgive him. But when you have gone to him alone, and he will not hear thee, will not repent—bestow forgiveness on him whether he desire it or not. (!)

Christ teaches a different process: you are to take one or two others, and go to him again. If he will not hear them—will not repent yet, tell it to the Church. Then it becomes a church matter, and not before; and, if he is still impenitent, let him be to thee as an heathen man.

In the twenty-first verse, in reference to the same subject, Peter asks—"how often shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him?" That is, how often shall I bestow forgiveness by this rule? Christ says, "until seventeen times seven." And then illustrates the subject, by a King who would take account of his servants. One was a defaulter to a large amount; and, when he fell down and asked for mercy, the King granted it. But when his fellow-servant (his brother) fell down before him and asked his mercy, and he would not bestow it, the King said, "I forgave thee, because thou desiredest me; shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee? I bestowed forgiveness on you, and you ought to have bestowed forgiveness on your fellow-servant, even as—equally, like unto, or, in like manner.

Truly Mr. A. is unfortunate, both in his position and in his witnesses to support it. They testify against him. And though the impetuous manner in which he runs through the subject is sufficient to make one think—"Young America" sure enough—the law of our duty is again found in what God does, as well as in what he directs. And nowhere has he directed us to bestow forgiveness on an offender, whether he desire it or not. I repeat, nowhere. But that we are directed to bestow forgiveness if he repent, is the clearest and most unmistakable teaching of God Himself. And, that this specific law of duty is also found in what God does, it is folly to deny. And when I affirm that Matt. xviii. 15, 21, and Luke xvii. 3, 4, have a direct point to personal offences between brethren, I put only give the Saviour's word for it, but I am in good company as well as in common sense. And when I teach that you must go to a brother who sins against you, tell him his fault and forgive him if he repent, I teach only the words of Jesus Christ. But if, after I have taken the matter through these progressive stages of duty he will not repent, and I let him be to me as a heathen man, I only obey my Lord, who assures me that this is the law of heaven; and whatsoever is bound by it on earth, is bound by it in heaven also. What is it then? It is this—God has a law in heaven on this subject, and has given it for the law of our duty on earth. And when we pray that God would forgive as we forgive, we only ask God to deal with us in the same manner that heaven's law requires us to deal with those who sin against us; and that is, to forgive him if he repent.

God is full of compassion and tender mercy—ready to forgive; but, under the law of redeeming mercy, He must withhold until the sinner repents and asks for it.

When man is converted to God, his heart becomes God's tabernacle; Christ dwells in him by faith—and he has the mind of Christ. Eph. iii. 17. I Cor. ii. 16.: and the God and his Christ that dwell in heaven, now in his heart under redemption's law, through its letter and spirit direct him to bestow forgiveness if he repents. And that we may be ever ready to perform this duty, we should always be full of the spirit of forgiveness; have it always on hand, that ye may be ready to bestow it when he does repent. But this will we do, if God and Christ be in us. For if these be in the man, ruling him by heaven's law of redemption, he receives damage in nothing by withholding forgiveness until the sinner asks for it. These conclusions are logical necessities from the clearest and most unmistakable teaching of God himself. And therefore I still maintain that it cherishes a dignified divinity; a sound, healthy divinity, that has no need of a doctor; and, that it cherishes a sublime morality, an exalted humility, and magnifies the name of God.

Homer, La., June 28th 1859. T. J. LACY.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

Marion, Alabama, July 4th, 1859.

Mr. Enron:—The commencement exercises of "Centenary Institute" have closed the most prosperous year the Institution ever enjoyed. Twice as many pupils, perhaps, have attended the schools of Summerfield the past year as ever were there before. The success of our Female Colleges afford a strong encouragement to the Church to labor on in this department of education. Exerting the greatest influence upon society—being the educator, companion, reformer, and often-times the representative of man, it is in the highest degree important that woman should be educated. The "bright morning star" of her millennium rays out upon the horizon. No longer is she to be regarded as the toy of an hour, to be discarded when the rose fades upon the cheek and the fire dims in her eye—but to be cherished, when the plough-share of years has done its furrow-work upon her cheek, for the nobility of her nature and the equality of her mental and moral rights.

"Centenary" is doing a blessed work for the Church—making her "sons as plants, grown up in their youth, and her daughters as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace." But I commenced to tell you of the exercises.

On Sunday, June 26th, the Rev. L. D. Husten, D. D. of the Kentucky Conference (and editor of the "Home Circle" at Nashville) delivered the Commencement sermon. It was overwhelmingly eloquent with feeling—as the thousand hearts that felt its pathetic power can testify. However great Dr. Husten may be intellectually, his power is in appeals to the heart. He is well entitled to the name—the "Summerfield of the West." Every one that knows Dr. Husten, or who reads the Home Circle, or who hears him preach, loves him. Long may he bless the Church with his sweet spirit and fervid eloquence!

On Monday the young men of the Male Department conducted their public orucular exercises. Prizes were awarded for the best elocution, to Messrs Walker and Mangum. Professor Fitts—a young gentleman of fine attainments, and a member of the faculty of the Male Department—delivered the Annual Address before the O. K. A. and Franklin Literary Societies. Brother Fitts goes to Tuscaloosa to practice law—may the court of Themis welcome and honor him!

On Tuesday was the anniversary of the Castalian and L. M. I. Societies of the Male Department. Compositions of fine finish were distinctly read by twenty young ladies of the junior class. In the afternoon the Rev. G. Baldwin addressed the Castalian Society in his happiest style, on "The woman we need;" and the Rev. H. A. M. Henderson followed, in an address to the "L. M. J. Society," on "the World's Heroines." At night, Professor Gleffer and his music class provided a concert—each successive piece of which was rapturously applauded.

On Wednesday morning the two graceful halls of the Literary Societies were dedicated by their respective orators. These halls are great additions to the buildings of Centenary, and the tout ensemble is now quite impressive; the halls cost about $25,000 each, and flank the building right and left. They are handsomely stuccoed, and otherwise finished inside—affording a beautiful retreat for the fair daughters of literature, who shall hereafter claim Centenary for their Alma Mater.

Great advantage is to result to the young ladies from these Societies—as was evident, from the style and manner of reading the compositions produced by them during the Commencement just passed.

At half-past nine o'clock the regular Commencement exercises begun in the Chapel—twenty essays were read by as many young ladies, constituting the Graduating Class. The most touching scene I ever witnessed, took place this day. A few weeks since, Miss Eliza Owen, a lovely member of the senior class, died most triumphantly; before she died, she had written her graduating composition—and what is a singular coincidence in it, addressed each member of her class personally—her name and subject appeared in the programme. A vacant chair, draped in mourning, occupied a place on the stage in the midst of the senior class. When her name was reached in the order of exercises, there was a dead silence for five minutes

"There is a language that is mute,
There is a silence that speaks."

So, on this occasion. Ah, it was an eloquence that opened every heart, and tears flowed like rain down hundreds of cheeks. At length President Montgomery arose and paid a tribute-eulogy to her memory. Gushing hearts sobbed out their sympathy, and the whole audience was eloquent with grief. The entire senior class was consolidated into a niobe, weeping voicelessly over the bier of their returnless classmate. When the President sat down Miss Driskill arose, and with the essay of Miss Owen hung in sable colors, proceeded to read it with a voice tremulous with the pathos of her sorrowing heart. The theme was—"the mission of each"; as each of the young ladies was addressed by the sweet voice of their classmate, speaking to them from the long grave—up, from the bright heaven—their hearts paid the tribute of love to her whose mission was to be an angel. Oh, how well calculated are such scenes of common sympathy to stir the soul and to make one think better of his race! The valedictorian was Miss Lucy Tarrant, the fair president of the L. M. J. Society. Long will the memory of her sweet smile, soft voice, and graceful manner, linger in the heart of your correspondent.

Grave editor, excuse me, for as Seneca said: "It is impossible, to approach the light without deriving some faint coloring from it, or to remain long among precious odors without bearing away with us some portion of the fragrance." As God bless Miss Lucy, and when the valedictory of her life is read, may she enter the heaven for which she is already pledged! After the valedictory the President conferred the diplomas in an appropriate baccalaureate; after which, Colonel S. R. Blake of Selma, delivered the Commencement speech. At night the halls of Centenary were thrown wide open, and social converse and innocent mirth closed the brilliant career of the Institute for 1859. H. A. M. Henderson.

THE EXAMINATION AT MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

The examining exercises of this popular and flourishing Institution began Friday the 24th, and closed Tuesday the 29th of June. Wednesday was Commencement-day.

A new and airy building was constructed for the occasion. The weather was generally pleasant. The citizens have made extensive preparations, and a cordial invitation was given to all to "make my house your home," and partake of the delicious luxuries that crowned the festal board. Such hospitality prepares the mind to rightly appreciate an Examination.

All anticipated a feast of delights; none were disappointed. The exercises began and continued in a thorough and confident manner—the teachers presuming the pupils were familiar with their studies, which was correct. The standard of scholarship in this Institution, is divided into five grades: failure, imperfect, good, superior, excelsior. We heard thirty-one classes examined; of these, none were marked failures; some good, more superior, and a few, excelsior. Among the best—we mention a class in English grammer, a class in Greek, one in Spanish, and another in Chemistry. For the latter, the apparatus was placed upon the rostrum, and the young ladies in an easy and graceful manner entertained and edified the audience—for a much longer time than was allotted them—by beautiful and useful experiments. Thoroughness is the prominent characteristic of the progress made by the pupils of this Institution.

During the occassion, two brilliant concerts were given. Nothing of the kind has ever equaled them here. The Musical Department, is able and varied. More competent teachers, apter pupils, better instruments, and more of them, we have not seen or heard tell of in any college.

The Curriculum is as extensive in this as in most male Institutions. The proficiency attained in Mathematics by the young ladies, totally dispels the "old notion," "Mathematics can't be understood by girls." They grasp the minutiæ of that science with much more facility than boys—hence the lucid explanations of the problems, which we saw them solve.

Besides the Spanish and French, the Latin and Greek languages are extensively taught—at least sixty pupils are studying Latin. What gems will they bring from these classic mines to enrich and adorn their own vernacular?

After the exercises closed, in company of several others, we were politely shown through the laboratory by one of the professors. The apparatus is complete—and better in some respects than that of any other Institution in the State.

We next visited the college grounds. The plat is symmetrical and beautiful; it contains about two miles of walks, and is neatly adorned with shade trees and shrubbery.

Our perambulation brought us to the dining-room—to the table loaded with "every-day fare;" this we enjoyed, and at once concluded that pupils fared better, nowhere that we have seen.

On Sabbath, the 26th, the "Commencement Sermon" was preached by the Rev. W. B. Hill, of Marshal Texas. He did what few ministers can do on such occasions, he satisfied expectation. All seemed delighted. Our people love him.

Wednesday was "the great day"—a brighter and happier has never dawned on Mansfield college. At an early hour the Orator of the day, the President and Faculty, the pupils, the trustees and the committee, met in Session Hall, formed a line, and marched in procession to the chapel. An interesting group, mutually bound to further the cause of education. The graduates, four in number, read their compositions; they were fraught with thought and beauty, and spoken with animation. At the speaking of the valedictory and one other, the audience were in tears. Then followed the baccalaureate by the President. It was filled with brilliant thought, and spoken in that sweet winning manner, peculiar to Doctor Tilwatt.

The Hon. W. Pinkney Hill of Marshal Texas, was then introduced to the audience to deliver an address to the Parthenomathean society. He spoke forty-five minutes. We can't do his address justice in a report, therefore shall not attempt it. The strength and brilliancy of the performance so filled us with admiration, that we have not yet regained presence of thought sufficient to enter upon its analysis. It will be noticed by an abler pen. Thus closed Commencement day.

THE BLIND GIRL AND HER BIBLE.

Have you seen a blind person by the wayside reading the Bible, printed in raised letters, by drawing the fingers along the lines? If so, have you not been thankful that such a new way has been found out that the sightless ones may read the word of God for themselves? You will then be pleased with an account given by a pious French minister, about a blind French girl and her Bible.

When I was a student, he says, I used to spend the summer holidays in traveling from village to village in my native France, preaching in the open places the kingdom of God, and giving the Bible to such as would accept it. On such a journey, in the summer, about twenty years ago, I went into a little vine hung cabin near Dijon. In its low, wide kitchen, I saw a middle-aged woman ironing, a boy yet too young for work, and a girl of eighteen, of a sweet, calm look, plaiting straw. She did not raise her eyes as I entered, and on a nearer approach I saw that she was blind. Poor blind Mary! How she was affected when I told her of Him who opened the eyes of the blind, and read to her how blind Bartimeus sat by the way-side begging, when he cried unto Jesus of Nazareth passing by, and received his sight. Then she felt a longing such as she had never known before—a longing for God's blessed gift of sight. The blind girl did not sigh to see the blue heavens, or the bright light, or to look upon her mother's sweet smile, or gaze in her young brother's blue eyes; no, not these, but she longed to read the blessed Word of Jesus.

There lived at Dijon, a man of God who had gathered around him a few blind, whom he had taught to read and work. I sought him out, told him of Mary, and soon it was agreed that she should come every morning and receive an hour's teaching. I also got her part of the Bible with raised letters for the blind. You should have seen her delight as she started off next morning—a bright August morning—one hand locked in her little brother's, and the other fondly grasping the precious Bible, to take her first lesson. Alas, poor Mary! it requires a fine touch to distinguish the slightly raised surface and nice outline of the letters, and her fingers were hard with the constant plaiting of straw. Again and again she made the effort, but to no purpose.

She tried to cut away the thick, hard skin from her fingers, but it would not do. After the first bitterness of her grief, Mary strove hard to be cheerful. "God has opened the eyes of my soul," she said, "and ought I not to praise him?" Then she thought of the new Bible. She felt she must carry that back; some happier blind girl might be able to read it. Then holding the dear volume near to her beating heart, she knelt by her white cot to pray: "Dear and blessed Jesus, who lovest the poor, and openest the eyes of the blind, I thank thee that thou hast not hidden thyself from a poor blind girl. And since I cannot read thy heavenly words, I pray that thou wilt whisper them into my soul, that my spirit may not be dark like my poor eyes. I can see thee with my heart, dear Jesus, and thou knowest that I love thee, and I love thy book;" and she touched the open Bible with her lips. Oh, joy! To the soft lips the slightly raised surface was clearly felt. With a low cry of joy she passed line after line across her eager lips. She turned the leaf; the lips lost not their power. It was all clear, all easy now; the lips could do what the hard fingers could not: she could now read God's holy Word!

A twelvemonth after, I visited Dijon. The old kitchen bore its old look, but what a beaming, happy face was Mary's, as she sat in her rude chair, her basket of straw at her feet, reading her beloved Bible. Well do I remember her words—"Is it not blessed to kiss the sweet words as I read?"

PREACHING.

Dr. Murry, in his interesting articles in the Observer, says:

"To make men see and feel the truth, is the great object of preaching; the Spirit of God, alone can make them receive the truth in the love of it. Mere doctrinal preaching cannot accomplish these ends. Nor can mere rhetorical preaching, where the idea is lost in the word. Nor can mere hortatory preaching; which is the same as firing a musket with enough powder, but no ball. We can preach on quaint subjects, like 'the marriage of Adam'—'the unfailing shoes'—the word 'and'—'the eagle stirring up her nest'—'not so'—the 'Druids'—'Heaven, country'—'the strong and the weak'—'the young folks at home'—spiritual humbugs'—'traffic in slaves'—but These, and all such, are pulpit clap-traps which may attract the vulgar, but which repel the intelligent; and which will soon place those who resort to them in the same category with the venders of quack medicines. The higher a man seeks to rise on waxen wings like Icarus, the greater will be his fall. The simple truth, simply presented, will do what no clap-trap ever has or can do. I heard the late Rev. Daniel Baker once preach a sermon on the text, 'and the door was shut.' There was not a thought in it beyond the comprehension of a child. I can never forget it. I heard Summerfield make one of his first addresses, if not the first he ever made in this country. He represented the Bible as the vine of Judea which ran over the wall; and he traced the vine running over sectarian, tribe, and national walls—over mountains, rivers, lakes, and oceans—over all the barriers which separated men and nations from one another, until it bore fruit on all sides of all walls, for the healing of the nations. Nearly forty years have since passed away, and the figure of Summerfield is yet before me in the beauty of meekness, and with the simplicity of a child tracing the vine of Joseph as it spread over the wall. I even now see his long, white finger making its undeviating line!"

ATROCITIES OF THE COOLIE TRADE.

The Hong Kong Press publishes these startling revelations of the manner in which the Portuguese carry on their Coolie trade:

"On the 4th of April, Pingking waited on Mr. Alcock the British consul at Canton, with numerous petitions from all the trades in Canton—dealers in foreign goods in the precious metals, in wood, in lead, in tea—no end of guilds. The petitioners prayed for foreign interference. The tale they told was frightful, and the wonder is that Cantonese do not treat the Portuguese as they did those of Ningpo. Many of the principal people at Canton have suffered the loss of relatives, who have been kidnapped in the streets and on the river. Chinese runners are of course employed. There are depots on the river at various points, in the shape of flower boats. Into these were the victims decoyed. Thence they were induced to go to Whampoa, where intimidation was used, and the victims starved into acquiescence.

The poor girls, who sell fruit on the river, have been hauled alongside and treated in the same manner. In one instance, a company of musicians were hired to play when they were seized and carried off! Some have actually been carried off in the open street, close to the Houan factories. The captors are paid $20 each for them, and the captured are principally received on board of and conveyed to Macao by the Portugese steamer Shumrock, owned by the enterprising Superintendent of Police at Macao. The Chinese assert that she has carried down some gagged. If so, we suppose she charges extra freight. On their arrival at Macao they are put into a barracoon, and starved or otherwise intimidated into compliance. It is true that they have to be visited by the Procuradore before shipment, for the purpose of collecting the emigration tax, but as testimony of the captors predominates, and as proof of previous acquiescence is the desideratum, the proceedings are a farce."

THE METHODIST.

I've read it with great pleasure and profit. The last volume is, in many chapters, powerful. That Conference Scene—Hurry's first—the venerable Bishop Roberts presiding, is inimitable, and will touch the tenderest heart. There are some mistaken views—at least as I see yet, altogether, evidence of a sweet Catholic spirit, and the best "common sense" pervades the entire work. Oh, Church of Wesley—of Asbury—of Capers! Christ continue to be thy head, and save thee from effeminating, defiling, "entangling alliances!"

God continues to love this blood-bought earth, and we fall, can give it a better ministry and a better Church. Let our people purchase and read the books now being issued from our press. It ought to be a pleasure and pride to Methodist preachers to circulate such books as Steven's History of Methodism; Strickland's Life of Asbury; Wightman's Life of Capers; McTyeire's Duties of Christian Masters; Cross' Headlands of Faith—one of the best books for a young preacher; and The Methodist Pulpit, South. Besides these, let every Methodist have a copy of The Golden Censer, and use it.

Tuscaloosa, June 25, 1859. JOSEPH B. COTTRELL.

THE QUARTERLY.

Our Southern Quarterly for July is an excellent number. Dr. Summers' other manifold labors do not prevent such attention to the Review as it needs to make it highly satisfactory to the reader. The following is a notice by the Editor of the contributions for the present number. The Editor's Department is to us the most valuable of all.

"Our Present Number.—The first article is in Bishop Andrew's usual felicitous style—a pleasing tribute to the memory of his late colleague. The second article is from the pen who wrote the review of Buckle in our January number—we do not, though for the matter of that, we need not give the author's name; it is equally necessary to characterize the paper—it is a study for a preacher. The third article is furnished by the Rev. W. H. Watkins, A. M., of the Mississippi Conference; he grapples with a foeman worthy of no ordinary antagonist. The fourth article, on Wesley's mother, from one of her own sex, specially commended to the regard of mothers in our communion. The fifth article, on the "Origin Progress, and Influence of Poetry," is from the pen of one to whom the Muses are no strangers. Our venerable friend, Mr. Philip I. Thomas, is between seventy and eighty, writes with the elasticity of youth. Some of our readers will not relish his estimate of the "Lake poets," but all will appreciate the scholarly tone of the essay. The sixth article is from the pen of a legal gentleman in Alabama. It will be considered an elaborate and valuable paper on a very important subject. We commend its careful perusal, specially to all who are engaged in the responsible work of female education. They ought to introduce the Quarterly into their respective institutions, if for no other purpose than to get the remaining articles of this number most, speak for themselves."

Methodist Quarterly Review, July, 1859. Contents—Latin Lexicography. St. Peter the Rock. Sam. Lewis. A half Century of Unitarianism. Early Methodist meeting Song Writers. The Rich Man and Lazarus. Purkerism. Excersus on the Seventh Commandment. Religious Intelligence. Synopsis of the Quarterlies. Quarterly Book Table.

The Rev. Bishop Pierce, who left New Orleans for California, via Texas and the southern route, arrived here (San Francisco,) last week with his family, and preached last Sunday at the Methodist Episcopal Church and at Calvary Church. [Picayune Correspondent.]

Meeting of the Educational Institute of the Methodist E. Church, South, will be held at Atlanta, Ga., on 27th inst. See notice in fourth column, third page.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Pikeville Mission.—Rev. D. S. McDonald writes: "I take this opportunity of making my report of this mission. Our second Quarterly meeting was held the 28th and 29th of May. It was an interesting time—a large congregation in attendance, both days. Rev. W. J. Powere the Presiding Elder, preached three good sermons before his departure—which had a blessed effect upon the people. Several penitents came to the altar for prayer, and three souls were converted.

"Since last quarter, sixteen persons have joined on probation and two by letter; one adult and four infants, baptized. The Sunday-schools are doing well. There are eleven schools, fifteen officers, fifty-six teachers, a hundred and eighty-six scholars, and only sixty-two volumes of books. But money, sufficient to purchase four libraries of fifty volumes each, has been collected, and the books sent for. They are soon expected to be here. These are the first Sunday-school books of our circulation ever bought for this mission. Those in use, are publications of the American Sunday-school Union.

"The prospect of an increase of pupils is fair, as there are hundreds of children that have never seen a Sunday-school who will be brought in after a while.

"I will surprise you, Mr Editor, but there are many people who do not appreciate a Sunday-school enough to send their children—and some are really opposed to them! I mention this, because such persons are subjects of special prayer, and I want God's servants to know it.

"The spiritual state of the Church, is greatly improved, and a glorious revival is expected this year. As the crops are nearly laid by, I expect soon to commence a series of two days meetings, which I hope will result in the conversion of many souls."

"Palo, Alobomo June 21st, 1859."

Big Swamp Mission.—Rev. Asa Skinner writes: "Dear brother, I send you my report of this mission, for the first and second Quarters. The Mission is in a healthy condition; but we still need suitable houses of worship. I have received into the Church, eighteen; and on trial, sixty-two; expelled four, and dropped four; baptized thirty-three adults, and twenty-eight children.

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

New Iberia Circuit.—Rev. T. B. White writes: "It is with gratitude to Almighty God that I inform you of the continuance of the gracious revival in my work.

"At Vermillionville we had a time of rejoicing. Our Quarterly meeting was attended by large crowds, who hung with delight on the Word. Bros. Fly, Alexander, Miller and B. F. White, were present, and did efficient service.

"Our new Church in this Catholic community is wielding a mighty influence for good. Three persons professed to find a personal interest in the blood of atonement—the same number joined the Church.

"At New Iberia our meeting has continued ten days and nights. The Church was greatly quickened and strengthened. The Word preached, "accomplished that whereunto it was sent." I have scarcely ever attended so long a series of meetings where there was so constant a Spirit of rejoicing. Six, whites joined the Church and a large umber of blacks.

"Bros. Miller and Alexander assisted through the whole meeting.

"There have been now about seventy additions to the Church, this Conference year. To God's blessed name, be all the glory Amen."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

London, June 22.—Nearly the entire Austrian army is now concentrated within the famous historic square.

The allies are besieging the great fortress of Mantua.

The Austrians, in accordance with a degree of the Emperor, have issued at Mantua, forced paper currency to the amount of $5,000,000.

Victor Emmanuel has officially declared that he would not consent to the annexation of any portion of the States of the Church.

The Austrians have abandoned Lonato, Castiglione and Metrepaz.

The Austrian troops again occupied Montellavo, on the 17th, in considerable force. A corps under some of Garibuldi's officers are stationed in the Valteline, but that section is not occupied by a French corps, as was reported.

Two thousand Papal troops have been sent from Rome to restore order in Pinegu.

At Cersia a collision took place between a detachment of the Papal troops and the inhabitants.

The allied troops were received with great enthusiasm throughout Lombardy.

The districts on the right of the Tiber in the Papal States, as also Linle and Decadello, have declared for the national cause.

Commissioners were sent to the King of Sardinia. The King told the Commissioners that the Pope had nothing to fear, that the independence of the Peninsular would be a guarantee of the neutrality and integrity of the States of the Church.

A dispatch from Berne, of the 18th, announces that the Austrians to great force have occupied the Stelvio Pass, blown up the Devil's Bridge, and planted artillery in the Pass, and also made entrenchments at Nanders.

A French corps d'armee is advancing by forced marches against this position.

Gen. Garibaldi is organizing a free corps in the Valteline.

The Austrians have destroyed the railway from Milan to Brescia.

Gold and silver medals are to be distributed to the Zouaves who distinguished themselves at the battle of Palestro.

A dispatch from Munich says the Major-General Von Toun has gone to Berlin on a special mission.

The London Times says that Kossuth is to be employed forthwith to act on the Austrian regiments of Hungary, and to produce, if possible, a revolt in Hungary itself.

Another dispatch from Prince Gortschakoff confirms the reports continually circulated that Russia has promised to assist France if the German Bund decides to go to the assistance of Austria.

A dispatch from Paris states that one hundred rifled cannon were sent to the army of Italy on the 17th.

Later from India.

Later advices forum India have been received in England which confirm the reports of the disaffection of the European troops.

There are signs of mutiny among the troops at Gwalior, Merub and other places.

Arrival of the Vigo.—Dates to the 25th ult.

The allied army have occupied Lonato, Castiglione and Mounte Chiaro, and were at latest advices making a general movement towards the river Mincio, where the Austrians have made a stand, and are preparing for a general engagement.

The Emperor Napoleon has joined the camp of the army.

A deplorable and sangulnary collision has taken place at Perugia an important town in the Papal States, between the soldiers of the Pope and the inhabitants of the town.

Prussia is marching a large army upon the Rhine.

Despatches from Paris announce that the Emperor Napoleon telegraphed to the Empress Regent, under date of Friday evening June 24th, that a terrible battle had been fought and a great victory achieved by the Allied army.

The whole Austrian army, and nearly the entire force of the Allied army were engaged in the conflict.

The entire Austrian army were formed in a line of battle and extended five leagues.

The battle lasted from four o'clock in the evening of Friday, the 24th.

The French took a large number of prisoners, flags and cannon.

About 400,000 men were engaged in the battle.

A Vienna despatch says that the battle was still progressing, but details of the engagement had been made known by the Government.

Previous accounts from the seat of war state that the Austrian force on the river Mincio was 280,000 strong; and that the entire French force had passed Mnnuto Chiaro; that they had made a reconnoissance as farus Gato; and that the Piedmontese army were advancing towards Peschiera.

Threatening Movements of Germany.

The Prussian Government had demanded permission of Hnnover to march 30,000 troops through that ter ritory to the Rhine.

It is rumored that prussia has threatened to assist in the suppression of the Hungarian revolutionary movements.

England.

Parliamentary proceedings have been suspended till the members of the new Ministry are re-elected.

It is reported that the new Ministry intend to curtail the naval expenditures.

The weather during the past week has been unfavorable for the growing crops. The general prospects of the harvest however, are favorable.

Arrival of the Hungarian.—Dates to the 29th ult.

The latest reliable despatches from the seat of war, left the Austrian headquarters at Villafranca, between the fortresses of Verona and Mantua, with the entire Austrian army concentrating on the left bank of the Mincio; and the allied army advancing towards the right bank from Castiglione. Before the army had reached the Mincio in force, the Austrians, with the entire force of their army, crossed to the right bank and took the initative in the battle.

A despatch of the 25th from Napoleon to the Empress Regent, says, "The enemy withdrew last night. I slept in the room occupied in the morning by the Emperor of Austria. General Nell greatly distinguished himself at the battle, and has been created a Marshal of France. The Austrians crossed the Mincio for the purpose of attacking us with their whole force, but were obliged to abandon their positions, and withdrew to the left bank of the river, blowing up the bridge at Goito, after them. We took thirty pieces of cannon, and 7000 prisoners."

Private despatches from the camp, via Turin and Paris, state that the Austrians had 35,000 men placed hors de combat, and lost sixteen flags, and seventy-five pieces of artillery.

Private telegrams from the seat of war intimate that the French army have suffered so severely as to be unable to resume the offensive.

Vague rumors were in circulation at Paris that the loss of the French army was 12,000 killed and wounded. The battle was fought at Salferino, a small town a few miles from Golto.

DOMESTIC.

Washington, July 8.—The receipts of the Treasury for the last week in June were $2,633,000. The amount of drafts paid was nearly $3,000,000. The drafts issued amounted to over $2,000,000. The balance remaining in the Treasury is $4,438,000.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Discontent of Italians.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, in his letter of June 15, writes:

"It is pretty certain that all Italians are not overjoyed at the off-hand manner in which the King of Sardinia is proceeding in his work of liberation, and accepting gifts of territory from the hands of his Suzerain. There are many patriots who have not co-operated in this work of Italian independence merely for the territorial aggrandizement of Victor Emanuel. What they desire is independence not only of the Austrians and French, but equaly so of the Piedmontese. They cry out against the sleight-of-hand—the escamotage, as they term it—by which Victor Emanuel is really taking possession of Lombardy; and I know of several Italians who leave Paris with the avowed object of resisting this invasion on the part of their Piedmontese liberators. Their motto is Confederation and not Fusion. The Lombards will not be Piedmontese any more than Tuscans, or Modenese, or Parmesans, or Neapolitans, and it would not be surprising if civil war followed any attempt to force them into submission."

The Dismissal of Gyulai.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Star, in his letter of June 12th, writes:

I have to announce to you the speedy dismissal of Count Gyulai. He is condemned by everybody as a most incompetent strategist. There is a misstatement alleged to have been willfully made by him, to the effect that the battle of Magenta was lost owing to the two divisions under Generals Cham, Ballas and Benedek, not having come up at the right time. This was asserted in a way that implied culpability in the conduct of those Generals, whereas the fact was that those divisions had not received orders from Count Gyulai to advance at all; and that they did so in obedience to the orders which those Generals took upon themselves the responsibility to issue, when they perceived the dangerous position of Count Gyulai. They are so indignant at this false calumny, that they have demanded a court-martial to examine the matter. This proceeding will result, it is generally expected, to the vindication of their military reputation, and to the condemnation of Gyulai, who is now the most unpopular man in Austria.

Telegraph from Falmouth, England, to Gibraltar Direct.

In view of the war in Europe, the British Government is taking measures to secure speedy communications with the British possessions in the Mediterranean, independent of any Continental medium. The London Daily News announces that Government has entered into arrangements for laying down, as speedily as possible, a telegraphic cable direct from Falmouth to Gibraltar—a distance of 1100 nautical miles.

Large Failure in Boston.

The Boston Transcript, of the 1st inst., says: The failure of Messrs. Wiggin, Morre & Co., wholesale grocers, State street, was reported yesterday afternoon. Mr. Wiggin, a former member of the house, has been dead some time, and the firm consisted of M. W. and M. E. Morse.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, July 11, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price Current, ending on the 9th instant:

The general business of our market, during the past week, has been on the usual limited scale of the season, though it will be seen that in the article of Tobacco, there have been transactions to quite a large extent, materially relieving the market, after several weeks of excessive dullness.

On Monday morning European advices four days later received by the Vanderbilt, from Havre and Southampton, 22d ultimo. The Liverpool Cotton market was reported quiet, with sales for three days of 17,000 bales. In prices there had been no marked change, but the quotations by the Arabia (8d for Fair Orleans and 6 15-16d for Middling ditto) were barely sustained, and the market was said to have closed with a declining tendency. The Manchester advices were favorable, but Consols had further declined ⅛ to ¼ per cent, being quoted at 92¼ to 92¾. On Thursday morning advices still three days later, brought by the steamers Vigo and Adelaide. They report a decline of 1-16 to 1d in the Liverpool Cotton market, with sales for the week ended on the 24th ultimo, of 35,000 bales, and the quotations given are 8¼d for Fair Orleans and 6¾ for Middling ditto. The total stock at Liverpool was stated at 733,000 bales, of which 670,000 bales were American. In the Havre Cotton market the week's sales were 7500 bales, and tres ordinaire was quoted at 107 francs, which would indicate an advance of 1f. Consols were reported firmer and quoted at 92¼ ex-dividend. Friday, advices still four days later were received, brought by the steamer Hungarian, from Liverpool to 29th ultimo. The Liverpool Cotton market was reported dull at about previous prices, with sales for three days of 18,000 bales.

Occasional showers have fallen within the past week, but generally the weather has been clear and pleasant, and the city continues remarkably healthy.

The river has fallen 7 inches within the week and is now 4 feet 2 inches below high water mark.

COTTON.—Our last report left the market in a dull state, and only a few buyers came forward on Saturday, taking barely 600 balas. Monday being our National holiday, business was entirely suspended, and on Tuesday morning European advices four days later were before the public, reporting a declining tendency in the Liverpool market, with sales for three days of 17,000 bales. The sales in this market on that day were about 1000 bales, and on Wednesday fully 2200 bales were taken. On Thursday European advices still three days later were received, reporting a decline of 1-16 to ⅛d in the Liverpool market, and the sales here were confined to a few small lots, barely amounting to some 800 bales. Friday there was some enquiry, but with advanced rates claimed for freight buyers were obstructed in their operations, and the sales were confined to about 700 bales. Thus the sales of the entire week sum up only 5300 bales. Total receipts of the week 1809, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,651,240 bales, against 1,547,732 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 6,742 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 8th inst. 41,376 bales. In prices a good deal of irregularity is observable, but the sales generally have been at rates within the range of our previous quotations, which are continued, though buyers are contending for a reduction equivaleat to the advance claimed in freights. The stock on sale is light, (some 20,000 to 25,000 bales) and consists mainly of the lower grades, which are nnsaleable and nominal.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

Pay Postage.—Persons writing on their own business, and requiring answers, will enclose a postage stamp; otherwise, they will receive no attention. This does not apply to our Agents.

What Name?—Contributions and Correspondence of whatever character, must be accompanied by the real name of the writer. Writers may publish over real or assumed names, as they choose; but, if the editor has not in his possession the real name of the writer, no communication will be published.

Free Papers.—All the Itinerant Ministers and Preachers of the patronizing Conferences are expected to act as our Agents, and will receive the paper gratis. Those of other Conferences will receive it gratis upon their proposal to act as our Agents.

Be Merciful to the Editor.—We receive, from all parts of the country, all sorts of requests and commissions, requiring attention to almost every kind of business. We have heretofore been compelled to give most of these things the cold shoulder. Hereafter, however, we are determined to have all these requests, if possible, attended to. Our clerk, Mr. R. Oliver, an excellent business man, will take them in hand, and be responsible.

Job-Work, of the finest kind, and of every variety, and in the promptest manner, will be done, if sent to the Advocate Office. Terms cash on delivery.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the New Orleans Depository, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

To all Dealers with Southern Methodist Publishing-house.

To carry out fully the spirit and law of the last General Conference in reference to the sale and circulation of Books, and to accommodate as far as possible all our customers, we have carefully revised our Catalogue, and modified the prices of our publications. Our new Catalogue will be issued at no distant day. In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers Books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On Books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. McFerrin, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicted.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

The Child and the Angels.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

The Sabbath sun was setting slow,
Amidst the clouds of even;
"Our Father"—breathed a voice below—
"Father who art in heaven!"

Beyond the earth—beyond the cloud—
Those infant words were given;
"Our Father," angels sang aloud—
"Father who art in heaven!"

"Thy kingdom come"—still from the ground,
That childlike voice did pray;
"Thy kingdom come"—God's hosts resound,
Far up the starry way!

"Thy will be done"—with little tongue
That lisping love implores;
"Thy will be done"—the angelic throng—
Sing from the seraph shores.

"Forever"—still those lips repeat
Their closing evening prayer;
"Forever"—floats in music sweet—
High 'midst the angels there!

Thine be the glory evermore,
From thee may man ne'er sever;
But every Christian land adore—
Jehovah!—God!—Forever!

A Workman Discouraged.

A superintendent who had labored long in a mission school, in one of the most needy districts in the city, had become greatly disheartened. He did not see the evidences of reform among his scholars that he desired. At the close of one of the sessions of the school, he called one of the boys to him, and said, "Johnny, I feel very much like giving up. I don't see that I am doing any good."

"Why, yes, you are doing good," replied the little fellow.

"No, Johnny; I don't see that I am."

"Yes, you are, too," persisted Johnny. "You are doing a great deal of good."

"How so?" answered the superintendent. "What evidence have you of it?"

"Why," said he, "ask anybody around here."

"Well," rejoined the superintendent, "what good do you know of?"

He replied, "You know Tommy S., don't you?" referring to one of the rudest boys in the school.

"Yes, Johnny. But what of him?"

"Why, he is trying real hard to be good."

"Trying real hard to be good," rejoined the superintendent. "What about him that makes you think so?"

"Well, I'll tell you," said he. "Before he came to our school, he was one of the worst boys anywhere around. One night a ship came into the dock, and before morning Tom stole a lot of copper off from her bottom, and sold it. He told me all about it the other day, and he is so sorry, I tell you. He is trying now real hard to be a Christian."

That superintendent has no more reason to be discouraged. He, like many other teachers, had a dark hour; but like the hour before daybreak, it soon gave way to a glorious morn.

We wish to ask our little readers several questions at the close of the above narrative. Is your Superintendent, or your teacher doing you any good? If not, whose fault is it? Do you listen carefully to Sunday-school instruction? Do you try to profit by it? Do you ask God to help you? If not, the best efforts of others for your good must fail.

"The Plank Bears."

A ship was wrecked some time in the last century on the coast of Cornwall. All hands went down save one sailor-boy who was washed on to the shore, barely living, and who lay, bruised and ready to perish, for weeks on a sick bed. He was visited by a young man—whether in or out of the pastoral office matters little—a young man who strove to lead the sinking sailor-lad to the cross of Christ as the Anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, in the storm which destroys both soul and body in hell. "Suppose," said the missionary, "that when your vessel was in pieces round about you off the coast, and you felt yourself sinking, exhausted, beneath the surge—suppose you had caught hold of a plank as it floated by you, and felt that, as you clutched it, it bore your weight, and held you up till relief could come, you would thank God for that plank would you not?"

"Yes, sir," gasped the boy; and the boy was made to understand that that plank was Christ, bearing up the spirit of the sinner.

Many years rolled away, and the Christian missionary toiled on, miles after miles from the Southern coast, in the midst of some Northern city. One day he was again in a sick-room. Everything showed that it was also a room ready for a death. They moved about silently and reverently, as men do when they expect the coming of the king of terrors. The sufferer was nearly gone. The visitor, true to his old calling, bent down to whisper to the dying man words about the great salvation, and the life after death. "Is it well with your spirit?" said the old missionary. And there was a sudden glance of the eye that had begun to fix, and the head turned round, and a last flash covered the white face, and then a smile, such a smile—"God bless you sir! The plank bears, sir! the plank bears!" And so it did. It had borne him ever since, and clinging to it, he got safe to land!

The Child's Answer.

Little Nellie L——— had lost her father, and her mother was poor. Her sweet temper and her winning ways gained her many friends. Among them was an excellent lady, Miss N———. A glimpse of Nellie's bright face peeping in at the door always brought a smile of peculiar tenderness over Miss N———'s placid features.

She loved to sit by the child, softly stroking her hair, and while looking thoughtfully into her smiling eyes, would often say, "poor, poor Nellie!"

When Nellie shook her head, with a heart too happy to forbode evil, her friend would caress her still more fondly, and then say, "poor, poor Nellie!"

The child's heart seemed troubled by these pitying words, for she asked one day, "why do you call me poor? Please don't Miss N—; I'm not poor—why I've got twenty-five cents and a good mother!"

"Rich little Nellie," said her friend. "A good mother! Ah, how long I was learning what this little one already knows."

"A good mother"—could any earthly treasure have made her so truly rich? [Am. Mess.

Power of The Bible.

A little girl had been attacked with a severe pain in the head, which ended in blindness. She was taken to an eminent oculist, who pronounced her incurable. She wished to know what the doctor had said about her state, and her mother told her. "What mother!" exclaimed the child, "am I never more to see the sun, nor the beautiful fields, nor you, my mother, nor my father? O! how shall I bear it?" She wrung her hands and wept bitterly. Nothing seemed to yield her the slightest comfort, till her mother, taking a pocket Bible from the table, placed it in her hands. "What is this mother?" inquired the disconsolate girl. "It is the Bible, my child." Immediately a score of its most consolatory passages presented themselves to her mind. She paused, turned her poor, benighted eye-balls toward the ceiling, while an angelic expression played on her countenance, and then, as if filled with the Holy Spirit, breathed forth in an impassioned, but scarcely audible whisper.—"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

ALONE! ALONE!

Oh the sadness of this little word! How much it implies—Alone! It falls on the ear with a deadening sound, like the knell of departed hopes. It speaks of past joys and buried happiness! Alas, who can tell all that is conveyed in this simple word—Alone!

What a life of wretchedness—how much misery it chronicles. All the more wretched and miserable because there are none to help us to bear our burdens. All alone, we must endure our woes. No sympathizing breast on which we can rest our weary head; or kindly listening ear, into which we can whisper our tale of grief and sorrow; nor may loving friend to sooth or counsel us.

All alone we must bear our burden and face the cold and cruel world—appear to be happy and gay—join the merry thoughtless throng—wreath our faces with bright smiles—greet those around us with light jesting words—while our hearts are well nigh ready to break with a sense of its utter loneliness. Oh, this is worst of all—to be alone—while surrounded on every side by joy, mirth, happiness, gayety, and those blest with loving friends. Could we go away and dwell in some lonely nook, where no sound or sight of human being could ever reach us or disturb our solitude—methinks 'twould be a happy lot. Then we could do and be what we really are, and not be compelled to act a part, which, while it is painful to us, is not beneficial or even gratifying to others.

Oh how the heart sighs for some lonely retreat—that it might dwell far away from the haunts of men; and pour forth its tale of grief to the sighing winds of the desert, and bleed and die alone; with none but God to care for it.

Alas! friendship is a word I scarcely know how to apply to the lonely. Some there are who prate much and prettily of its beauty and loveliness; but they are fond enthusiasts, and have not learned the bitter lesson taught by the word, ALONE.

Heaven help those who are Alone!

THE TWO STREAMS.

Behold the rocky wall
That down its sloping sides
Pours the swift rain-drops, blending as they fall,
In the rushing river tides!

Yon stream, whose sources run,
Turned by a pebble's edge,
In Athabasca, rolling towards the sun
Through the cleft mountain ledge.

The slender rill had strayed,
But for the slanting stone,
To evening's ocean, with the tangled braid
Of foam-flecked Oregon.

So from the heights of Will,
Life's parting stream descends,
And, as a moment turns its slender rill,
Each widening torrent bends—

From the same cradle's side,
From the same mother's knee—
One to long darkness and the frozen tide,
One to the Peaceful Sea!

SINGING TO HER BABE.

I passed a dwelling in Duke-street. The front door was open, and close by the step sat a young wife singing to her babe. There was a low sweet melody in her voice!—true, the words were very simple, but all the fascination of song was there. The little babe, not yet able to make the adventurous circuit of the room, lay quietly upon her lap; its little hands were folded across its breast, and its soft beautiful eyes seemed to dilate with joy and wonderment, as the musical sounds fell upon its ears.

Singing to her babe! A scene, indeed, to touch the soul with quiet pleasure. A mother's heart wrapped up in her first-born; her joy, her light, her very life! Already she was dropping soft, welcome sounds into the teachable soul. I could not help murmuring:

"Rich, though poor!
That low-roofed cottage is this hour a heaven—
Music is in it—and the song she sings,
That sweet-voiced wife, arrests the ear
Of the young child, awake, upon her knee."

Singing to her babe! Would it be hers to lead those tiny feet into the way of righteousness, and by the river of Everlasting Life?

"She was one who held a treasure,
A gem of wondrous cost;
Did it mar her heart's deep pleasure,
The fear it might be lost?"

She could instill into that young and impressible mind the knowledge of good and evil, the life-toned integrity of the soul, the earnest faith that hopeth and believeth all things in Christ. As she watched its slow, yet delightful appreciation of objects and words—as she noted its developing intellect—did she feel her responsibility? Was she conscious that she held the silken cords in her hand that were to bind the present to the future?

Singing to her babe! As I gazed upon the scene, I could not help wondering what the fate of that dear child might be. Would it remember the earnest lessons learned from its mother's lips! Would it treasure her precepts, and follow her example? Or would it drift idly upon the sea of life, careless where its world of truth might be, and sinking at last to a dishonored grave? Would it exclaim, when age lined the dark locks with silver, and added a tremor to the voice;

"Yes, I have left the golden shore,
Where childhood 'midst the roses play'd;
Those sunny dreams will come no more,
That youth a long bright Sabbath made.
Yet, while those dreams of memory's eye
Arise in many a glittering train,
My soul goes back to infancy,
And hears my mother's song again!

OVERDRESS OF LADIES IN TRAVELING.

"Our wives and daughters lose three-fourths of the pleasure of summer travel, by the inexcusable, the execrable perversion of true taste and common sense, in dressing for a railcar or a steamboat as if they were going to a Court reception. It does seem that they have no more sense of the fitness of things than idiots. Cannot some few gentlemen have their own way for once, and thereby set the fashion by dressing the families for a summer travel in plain, substantial garments, allowing no member anything beyond what a small carpet bag would contain, and which should be the sole article which each one was to take care of? Let us all "put ourselves upon our behavior," and not on our dress. The fact is, the clerks and proprietors of hotels, the captains of steamboats, the conductors of railroads, see at the very first glance the real status of a traveler; the dullest chambermaid, the most stupid cabin boy, and the laziest waiter, are neither dull, nor stupid, nor lazy, nor erring either, in the estimate they make of the people, as if by intuition."

JAPANESE ROBES.

The Secretary of the Interior has received from the Department of State two cases containing fifteen silk robes, presented by the Government of Japan to Townsend Harris, Consul-general of the United States, upon occasion of his audience with the Emperor. These robes are of the finest quality, and are similar to those worn by Japanese officials of rank. They have been deposited in one of the cases of the Patent Office for safe-keeping, where they will doubtless attract much attention from those curious in such matters.

LAND OF THE LIVING.

That was a beautiful idea, expressed by a Christian lady on her death-bed, in reply to a remark of her brother who was taking leave of her to return to his distant residence, that he should probably never again meet her in the land of the living. She answered: Brother, I trust we shall meet in the land of the living. We are now in the land of the dying."

THE PRESIDENT'S AGE.

Mr. Buchanan will be nearly seventy years of age when he leaves the Presidency in 1861. His birthday is on the 22d of April. Mr. Buchanan will thus be a little older than was General Jackson when his second term expired, and older, by more than five years, than was Gen. Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Jas. Madison, James Monroe, or John Quincy Adams; by twelve years than John Tyler, James K. Polk, Millard Fillmore and Franklyn Pierce, at the termination of their political life.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

GUSTAVUS A. SHIELDS is dead! He died of pulmonary consumption, at the residence of his step-father, James A. Hutchinson, in Claiborn county, Mississippi, on the 22d inst. aged about 25 years. He was born at Cherry Farm, a few miles from where he died, on 14th April, 1834; was educated partly in Mississippi and partly in Alabama. When he had finished his education he returned home—where he spent his time in attending to the business of the farm. His father having died some time previous, the care of the family, to a considerable extent, devolved upon him—he being the eldest son. About the first of March last, he found that his lungs were seriously diseased, and thought that a visit to his friends and relatives in Alabama might be of service to him; he received no benefit however from this change; the disease progressed so rapidly, that his physician told him he had better hasten home if he wished to die there—for he must die soon. When he arrived at home he was reduced almost to a skeleton, and all hope of recovery was gone. In this condition he lingered about two weeks, when his sufferings terminated in death. The writer visited him a few days before his death, and he seemed to be cheerful—talked freely—said he would die, and seemed perfectly resigned to his fate. The family and friends assembled in his room; where, in solemn prayer, we commended him to Almighty God. We learn that a few hours before he expired, he said to his affectionate mother—who watched over him with all a mothers love—"Mother, let me sleep! and do not wake me—for I shall fall asleep in the arms of Jesus." And he slept—to wake no more till the trump of God shall rouse him from the long sleep of death. Thus passed away one of the best young men in the community in which he lived. Of him, we we think it may be truly said, he was beloved by all who knew him. His loss is deeply regretted by a large circle of sympathizing friends. His remains were buried in the old family burying ground—near the former residence of his parents.

Holly Springs, Mi. June, 30, 1859. D. A. J. PARKER.

—ABRAM MILES died at his residence in Pike county, Alabama, June 19th, 1859, in the eighty-sixth year of his age.—He was a native of Virginia; for many years a citizen of Baldwin and Twiggs counties, Ga. Among the early settlers of East Alabama—he became a citizen of this county, where he has proved himself to be uncompromising in his adherence to principle. No consideration could induce him to depart from the principles of strict justice; and, being possessed of those qualities which never fail to win hearts, he has formed a wide circle of friends who mourn his departure. In 1839 he sought and found peace with God—at which time he attached himself to the Missionary Baptist Church: but, in 1842, transferred his membership to the Methodist Episcopal Church. During his Christian pilgrimage, his adherence to the doctrines and principles of Christ have been such that his peace has been but little, if at all, disturbed. For three years he has borne with Christian fortitude the most severe afflictions; and, in his last moments, declared his confidence unshaken in the merits of his Redeemer. We, who know him but to love him, comfort ourselves with the thought, that our loss is his eternal gain.

Perote, Ala June, 1859. J. C.

H. E. RHOAD died at his residence in Monroe Co., Alabama, May 6th, 1859. The subject of this memoir was born on the 27th day of January, 1807; was married January 31st, 1828; professed faith in the Savior, and united with the M. E. Church during the fall of 1829. From which time, it is said by those who knew him most intimately, he gave the most satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of his faith and happy conversion to God. Bro. Rhoad not only loved God but he loved the Church, and was strict in his adherence to duty, and all the precepts and ordinances of the Gospel—family prayer especially. He fell a victim to that slow but fatal malady, the typhoid fever. Died as he had lived, a good man, in great peace of mind, being loved and esteemed by all who knew him. Leaving behind him his class, of which he had been the leader for years, his beloved wife, already worn down by sickness and care, and a number of orphan children, to mourn their loss. "Let me die the death of the righteous, etc."

GEORGE W. RHOAD, after a protracted illness, died at the late residence of his father, May 30th, 1859. George was born January 14, 1839, and, being reared by pious parents, his mind was early impressed with the importance of our holy religion. But not until his last illness and consequent near approach of death, did he make a full surrender of his young heart to God. This he was enabled to do by the grace of God, the week previous to his death, from which time he gave the fullest and most satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of his faith in, and conversion to God. His soul overflowed with love, and there was manifested such a degree of submission and resignation as is rarely witnessed in one so young. In this state he continued until all sense of everything earthly failed him entirely. The view he had of the blessed Jesus, however failed him not; for in this condition, he would affectionately embrace each person or thing that presented themselves, or came within his reach as his blessed saviour. Thus he died in the prospect of a sure and certain hope of glory and immortality.

REBECCA LEWIS, wife of Dr. W. L. Lewis, died in Hillsborough, Alabama, on the 17th ult. She was born in Pendleton District, S. C., Sept 27, 1815; professed religion and joined the Methodist Church when about 17 years of age—of which, she lived and died a consistent member. And though long afflicted, she suffered with Christian fortitude. She spoke frequently of dying and of the cares she would leave behind; and though, in the early part of her illness she was unwilling to resign those cares, yet, towards the closing scene of life, she became perfectly submissive, feeling assured, no doubt, that an All-wise Providence would direct them. She leaves a husband, five children, and a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn her loss—but their loss is her gain. May the Great Head of the Church sanctify it to their good; and, finally, bring the remaining portion of the family to the enjoyment of the company of those who rest in a brighter, better world.

MRS. MARY ANN BEACHAM, wife of Hugh L. Beacham, and daughter of Joseph and Martha E. Magee, died in her twenty-first year, in Copiah county Mississippi, June 57, 1859. She was a dutiful and affectionate daughter, and a devoted, loving wife. While in the bloom of youth and beauty, she chose Mary's better part, and gave her heart to God. Although her suffering was of a very severe character, yet it was not sufficient to divert her mind from her Savior. A short time before her death, she called her husband, father, sisters, and attending physician, to her bed-side, and exhorted them to be sure to meet her in heaven. Her death was a triumphant one. May her husband, relatives and friends, strive to meet her in that blessed and bright abode, where parting is no more.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage in a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint to the Constitution and to the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. No can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Cholaris or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrotula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SCROFULA—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by the Panacea, our Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MOAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle effected a permanent cure though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,
C. K. STEVENS

TRUTH UNDOUBTED.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Neely, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those to whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and, strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. NEELY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 11th, 1858.

DEAR NEELY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, immediately, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant; but to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with the rosy evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are clothed, 1st, because of my sympathy heretofore to mothers of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

Helps to Relief Extract of Buchu,

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.

MR. T. HUDSON.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affection of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It effected me immediately relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you in introducing the medicine, I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

The Goddess Hygeia!

When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to mee,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not in a labored few she showed the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic theirs,
Aed think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind command she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save."
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind.
Nor Wound nor Bruise, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its rude appearance long retain.
Use it—you'll find we are not truth's detractor,
For you'll be healed by

Dalley's Pain Extractor,

The only sure, effective and complete remedy for Bruises, Scalds, Eruptions, Piles, or any Cutaneous disease whatever.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. As Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some to my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.

The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviate.

Physicians generally now use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be administered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will always destroy Worms and restore the patient to health.

Save the Children.

Of the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms, or of diseases arising from that cause. A medicine like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will healthily and rapidly cure the disease, is there fore of immense importance to every family. It is extolled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any

SECOND LETTER FROM WASHINGTON.

June 11th, 1859.

Mr. Editor: The improvements of this building are on a magnificent scale, the two wings have added to it massiveness and strength. The marble mouldings within and stair casings, are not surpassed in any country. The Vice President's room is a gem of beauty. Its walls, and mantle pieces, were composed of Siena marble of the finest polish, with the color of porphyry—and adorned with magnificent mirrors—rows of white marble columns with Corinthian capitals, most exquisitely sculptured. The arched ceiling, inlaid with the same material, in forms of architectural taste, to harmonize with the rest. The one, called the gold-room, for the reception of the Senate—with its frescos and gilded carvings, most elaborately wrought—is exceedingly splendid. When all the departments of the two wings of the capitol, and the observatory at the top are finished, it will bear comparison with any building in Europe that we have seen; and, when the grounds around it are enlarged and improved, as they are designed to be, the nation may be proud of the noble structure, and the paradise of beauty which will surround it.

But the old capitol, who has ever noticed it? a prim, three-story, puritanical looking building on the corner of 1st street, back of the present one. There it stands in unsophisticated simplicity, nothing to distinguish it but its doors, with arched glass windows on each side of the street, on both stories, one above the other. In one wing of the building is a sculptured head, placed under the cornice of the door, the design of which we could not tell—it had a smiling aspect, perhaps to represent liberty.

Great has been the change in our progressive world since that building was erected; and, although its plain republican aspect is devoid of taste, there are holy memories clustering around it, in thought and feeling associated with those master spirits and patriots, who secured our freedom and laid the foundation of this noble edifice.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS.

A deep spirit of piety is felt in this city, and the power of the Gospel is made known in its aggressive movements in society. Union prayer-meetings are held every day in the different Churches and Sabbath-schools, and are doing a great interest—about 7000 children are classed among them; and we heard an excellent sermon addressed to the teachers of one branch, by the Rev. M. Gadal, with some most appropriate remarks relative to their responsibility; and, also, to parents, on taking a social interest in the schools themselves, and visiting them. The children sang very well, but not better than some of Jefferson Sunday-school. May God prosper that church and school.

VISIT TO MOUNT VERNON.

Washington, June 12, 1859.

We joined a party on a visit to the residence of the Father of our Country; and sailed down the Potomac, and scenes of increasing beauty, on which his eyes had smiled with increasing delight; its banks were crowned with the richest verdure in its native freshness of spring-like green, and all the variety of light and shade, rendering it peculiarly attractive.

We landed at the old dilapidated wharf, and proceeded up the sloping hills, upon the most miserable pathway of decayed and broken plank, to the venerated tomb. The tomb, about half-way between the shore and the mansion, was the first object of interest we met; it has now become the shrine for our country's pilgrimage—multitudes are coming and going during all the summer. The large iron-fronted door, in front of the tomb, is so constructed as to give a full view of the two marble sarcophagi which contain the remains of the venerated patriot and his wife, in all the simplicity of character and moral grandeur which crowned their days. They needed no pyramid or lofty monument on which to inscribe their names, for their memories are written upon the hearts of a nation. The Hero's fame will grow brighter and brighter while the world stands—and, like the light of a Pharos upon a dark stormy sea, will show a safe harbor upon the Rock of Freedom and Virtue.

It was a calm, solemn place, with most hallowed associations, calculated to sober the minds of the thoughtless and banish all levity from the hearts of those visiting that interesting place. A few family monuments surround the tomb, with two obelisks, one on each side.

It is a lovely sanctuary for the dead, where the Father of our country is seen in his last resting-place by all who love his memory and esteem his virtues. But every thing around shows neglect and want of attention. The walks, winding along the wooded avenues leading to the mansion, are waiting the transforming power of taste; when it falls into the hands of its fair purchasers, and immortalizes the noble zeal of the ladies who rescue from ruin this lovely villa—more sacred in its very loneliness and unpretending bearing than the proudest monuments of Rome or the palaces of the Cæsars.

The mansion is a relic of republican antiquity, but without design or artistic beauty, it is a fair specimen of the architectural style of the days when our forefathers triumphed over foreign despotism, and unfurled the "star-spangled banner" to the gaze of an astonished world! The buildings are fast going to decay—yielding to the scathing hand of time, which marks its broken columns, paved terraces and surrounding arcades.

Washington had an eye to the picturesque in all his plans; and when they are restored, will appear in perfect harmony with nature, which has been lavish of its beauties in adorning this lovely retreat. No plan could have been chosen better adapted to the improvement of cultivated taste, than these grounds—where the sloping hill-side and lawns, covered with a park-like verdure, woodlands with the dense foliage of magnificent trees—presenting a landscape as varied as it is beautiful. Fine views of the Potomac are seen from every elvation. The beautiful everywhere prevails and blends with the picturesque to each lovely prospect.

The simplicity of the interior of the mansion is associated with the early settlement of the country—when this was the seat of elegance, where visitors from other countries felt honored to be entertained as guests. The rooms retain some of the furniture which then adorned them. A few pictures hang upon its walls in the same place he put them; and a mirror, which reflected their features, radiant with moral beauty, still hangs there, as a specimen of other days.

In the large hall a marble mantle-piece with sculptured figures of artistic beauty remains, a relic of no common interest, being a present to Washington from General Lafayette, and sent from France. The rooms are old fashioned, with low ceilings and cornices over the doors, like those upon the roof of a house. The site of the house is very beautiful, and the grounds back, laid in circular and straight walks with lilio gardens, containing plants and trees of many years growth, which fully set the charming picture, redolent with natural beauty.

When this place is restored and its original design carried out, with suitable improvements, it will become one of the most lovely retreats in America; worthy of its ancestral name and of a pilgrimage to its shrine.

PORT WASHINGTON.

On our return we stopped to ascend its heights and enjoy one of the most magnificent views of the country; in the graceful bend of the river, where the scenery is perfectly charming on the opposite shores, and around the fort. The fortification is massive, and strong and kept in good repair it pays for the exertion of ascending its height.

CALORAMA.

How the homes of the poets are honored in England! Every foot of earth, shrub or tree, is invested with an interest like a charmed spot. There is something that effects the imagination like the spell of genius, throwing around us its magical world, and tinging each object with rainbow hues. It is the homage of the heart to the intellectual world which kindles up the sweetest sympathies of our natures in all that is dear in domestic and social life.

Every fireside has its altar of poetry, and the most retired and humble cottage is cheered by its inspiration and hallowed by its power; although unacknowledged, the affections are warmed by its influence; for, where the native song is heard, there poetry lives, written upon the heart which responds to the music of love and friendship. The Cotter's Saturday-night has moved more hearts and softened more spirits than the sublime eloquence of the greatest orator of the world.

We have our poets as well as England, and some of their homes are as beautiful. The Caloraina, chosen by one of our poets of early times, (Joel Barlow) situated in the environs of Washington, is worthy of its name and a visit.

He did not reside there many years, being engaged in the services of our country abroad; yet the grounds were laid out by himself with the taste of a poet, and leaves an impress of his genius. He must have delighted to revel in the rich luxuriousness of this lovely retreat. It is almost hidden in front by a dense grove which surrounds it, through which an avenue opens in a winding way up to the mansion, among grassy lawns, undulating hills, beautiful woodlands and little sunny nooks adorned with shrubbery, gardens with flowers and rare plants. The trees of box, now twelve feet high, were planted by himself. The house and improvements are chiefly modern—as it has passed through the hands of many occupants. The present owner is C. Fletcher, Esq., who politely showed us all the grounds and the beautiful vistas opening from his residence, through the woods down the sloping hill-side, presenting views of all the public buildings of Washington, and the Potomac river on its winding way.

Back of the Mansion, an avenue opens through a lovely grove terminating in a grassy knoll, where a few rustic seats are placed—a substitute for a temple built by the poet; and, probably, dedicated to the Muses, for the whole place seemed full of their inspiration—as inviting and picturesque as the Hermitage of J. J. Rosseau, in Montmorency, France. And although the poems of Joel Barlow are something quaint, and his style unlike the modern, yet his Columbiad has some beauties; and the humorous style of his Hasty-Pudding—lately republished, with illustrations, in Harper's Magazine—entitles him to a respectable position among the poets of America. His home is clad with poetical as well as historical interest.

Washington, it is said, first fixed upon the location as a residence for himself; but declined it on account of its proximity to the city.

The poet died in 1812, when on an embassy abroad for our government, for he was a statesman as well as poet. His wife as well as several of her kindred died at this place—a simple enclosure contains all that was mortal of them—no monument is reared to their memory.

CAMP-HILL, THE OBSERVATORY.

Is situated upon one of the most elevated banks and graceful bends of the Potomac river, it commands one of the fine panoramic views of the city, and may be classed among the loveliest green spots in its environs. Here the city is seen with its most prominent public buildings, not in scattering fragments, far apart, but as a whole to the best advantage, relieved by trees and gardens, with the capitol to crown its brow, and the monument when completed will give the finishing touch—towering above it towards the arch of heaven, tinged with the hues of Washington's undying fame. This isolated spot is beautiful, its grounds planted with trees and laid out in fine walks; with its observatory, and Lieut. Maury's residence, well suited for the retirement of a philosophical mind. On the opposite side of the river, upon a commanding elevation, was seen the beautiful residence of the late Custis family, associated with those of Gen. Washington and connected with his interest; that residence is said to afford the finest views of the city, of any point from whence it can be seen. Arlington, Springs, below it, is a celebrated place for festivals, and the music from the "Saenger Bund" burst upon us from a company of Germans collected from the different States who kept their yearly fete at that place, with music and orations. They had a procession by torch-light, and walked pass the President's mansion through the city.

Comp-hill was so named from the landing of Gen. Braddock's army, on its way to Pittsburgh; at Rock-creek the wagons broke down and scattered their gold coin, contained in kegs; and not long ago laborers, while digging, found many of the pieces deeply imbedded in the earth.

THE TREASURY.

This beautiful marble edifice, of Grecian architecture, with its long row of marble columns and Ionic capitals, stands out in relief like a magnificent temple, vieing in elegance, (like the Patent Office,) with any European building, in foreign lands. The Smithsonian Institute is a noble pile, rising in stately grandeur, surrounded by grounds, when planted and improved in the style for which they are designed, will equal in picturesque beauty any favored spot in our country. The Norman style of this stately edifice is perfectly unique, unlike any other in the city or perhaps in the United States in its form and structure, and it is designed to occupy a high position in the future destiny of our country, both in the sciences, fine arts, and literature. Its halls for lectures are convenient, and elegant; its galleries when stored with the efforts of genius will appear to advantage; and Stanley's, which is now filled with the Portraits of the Aborigines of America is worthy of admiration, a masterly production characteristic of the various tribes of the wilderness, with their customs and costumes, most admirably represented—each savage has a marked expression, from the most wild to those with slight touches of civilization, and some who have been educated. It is a history in itself, a study worthy the attention of travelers in this New World of wonders, and well suited to illustrate the early race, and show the traces of civilization. This gallery is large, handsomely arranged and in good taste.

DECLINE OF JUDAISM.

The observations I made during this visit were instructive and interesting in several respects. I have had occasion to make myself acquainted with the advantages the Jews in Belgium and France have derived from having been entirely emancipated. In a worldly point of view they are great. The Jew, in these two countries, is no more shut up in a separate quarter; in the eye of the law he is not a Jew, but a Belgian, or a Frenchman; he may devote himself to any career, and may rise to the highest office in the State. In fact, that which is lawful to the Gentile is lawful to the Jew; and I believe they are, with very few exceptions, in easy circumstances. But emancipation has well nigh annihilated Judaism. The Synagogues are empty; the rabbis are without influence and without congregations; and thousands of Jews, denying their origin, have lost all nationality and love for their own country and Jerusalem; they have Gentilized their names and their manners; and, in a few years, when the census is again taken in Belgium, there will not perhaps be one who calls himself a Jew. In France, if possible it is even worse. A Jewish-French periodical says of the majority of the Jews in France, "that they do not visit the synagogues, that they send their children to Gentile schools, do not have their sons circumcised, and are rarely present at any real Jewish ceremonies." They might have added, they have their children baptized soon after they come into the world, like Adolph Cremieux, who had his son and daughter baptized by a Romish priest the morning after their birth; but he himself continues to be a Jew.—Notes of a recent Tour on the Continent by a Jew.

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

Fourth of July—Important Movement among the Laymen—A Shaking of Dry Bones at the Book Room—St. Paul's Missionary Movement in the City—Some Signs of a Sabbath in New York—Stevens' History—New Reform Movements—The Wire.

The Fourth of July was the finest day I have ever seen either North or South. The third was cloudy, warm and oppressive; and during the day considerable rain fell, completely cleaning the streets. Towards midnight the clouds dispersed, and the sun rose in all its beauty on the Fourth, accompanied with a fine cool breeze, which continued throughout the day—no heat, no dust. There were fewer accidents and fires than usual. A fine military parade occurred early in the day; the usual ringing of bells, firing of cannons, etc., at sunrise, noon, and 6 P. M. took place; and in the evening a grand display of fire-works, almost everywhere, set the city seemingly in a blaze. Gunpowder was Chief of the day.

A memorial to the General Conference is now in circulation, and extensively signed; stating, in substance, that you, the General Conference, mol yon, the preachers, separated the Church once without our consent or advice; this is therefore to notify you that you are not to do it again, nor to make any new test of membership. The document is very ably written, though very short—Rev. G. R. Crooks is its author. It will go from New York and Boston signed by thousands of the most prominent men in the Church. As the Conference approaches, many of these in power at the Book Room begin to tremble as to their fate for the next four years, having, as they find, stirred up a hornets nest, in measurably abolitionizing instead of christianizing the Sunday School Advocate, the Quarterly Review and other publications. Dr. McClintock gave place to Dr. Wheedon on the Quarterly Review, in order to give him and his family a living; and by a foolish yielding to a distracted public sentiment, he has crippled a valuable publication, and cut off his own supplies;—he now sees, or pretends to see his folly, and solicits a prominent and able writer here to write a Defence of Colonization for the Review and he will publish it. It will be done. The motive is apparent.

The Sunday School Advocate has been victimized to the same fell spirit, and recently more so, by solely publishing a violent tirade of Rev. McMattison, an insubordinate madman—once talented and useful, now a "fell destroyer" in all his movements. The Editor, (Mr. Wise) of the Advocate, steers for the main current like most Yankees in Church or state—he may run ashore in his pursuit of dark colors.

Forty-six thousand dollars missionary money would have been better spent elsewhere than in Missouri and Arkansas during the last six years.

The steeple of the fourth Avenue Church, (St. Paul's) is now finished, and makes a very handsome and imposing structure. Don't know how the old gentleman himself would like it, could he be here; but his friends like it very much.

The East side of the city have formed a domestic Missionary Society, which promises much good. The two last Sabbaths, some little respect has been shown for the day, by putting up the shutters of 8000 grogshops; but at night the gas of their infernal dens reveals the fact that they are neither dead nor asleep.

Stevens' second volume of Methodist History will be out of press, about the 15th of this month.

A new Reading Room has been opened in the Fourth Ward, for the benefit of unfortunate men, and Orville (Awful) Gardner placed at the head of it; and, by its designs, locality and his example, may prove beneficial. The war still rages—and it is feared that all Europe, after the next great battle, now expected daily, takes place, will become involved in its bloody strife. May God avert it.

TENSAS AND ELIZABETH CHAPEL.

Kirk's Ferry, Tensas, La., July 5th, 1859.

Occasion for joy and thanksgiving is granted us by the watchful providence that holds the waves subject to his bidding. A short time since, the swelling Tensas, flinging its waves far out into woodland swamp, aroused our apprehensions of an overflow. The interested, day after day, carefully and anxiously marked and measured its rise and rapidity. Soon skiffs were substituted for horses; and you might see the people far and near flying upon their wooden wings, as though in their native element.

I reckon you did not know that we are a kind of amphibious animal here. If I were a Baptist, but little trouble would occur: for the water rolled upwards of two feet beneath me while endeavoring to preach, about the fountain opened in the house of David. Still the waters rose, putting on a more threatening aspect. Fears increased, hopes were dying, and all, with failing hearts, saddened looks and dejected mien, were anxiously watching the rising, raging tide—when lo! it paused; and at God's rebuke fled away.

Our immediate vicinity was but little inundated. The people rejoice, while the luxuriant corn and cotton promise the laborer abundant reward for his toil. Despatches from a distance, however, bring the woeful tale of suffering and loss.

From these things may we learn wisdom. Man, too often careless and regardless of his highest interests and holiest aims, would loose sight of the things which make for his peace, were it not for the merciful interposition of an ever-watchful providence. God sometimes gives reins to the wrathful elements and lets them drive, with, seemingly, no law to govern but confusion, no aim but ruin and death, in order to arrest us in our hurry heedless, thoughtless progress; and remind us who gives them law and latitude. May we learn to look at things in the pure sunlight of heaven; to regard life in its spiritual aspects and loftier issues.

The water disappearing, prepared the way for our third Quarterly meeting, which we have just finished amid the general out-bursting of thanksgiving for the timely deliverance. Our Presiding Elder was promptly at his post, exhorting the people to "Quench not the Spirit." The Lord graciously revived his work among us: Christians rejoiced, and sinners flocked to the standard of the cross. We can report thirteen accessions: eight white and five colored. May God help them to remain faithful to their high and holy calling in Christ their Redeemer. My soul doth magnify the Lord!

GREAT REVIVAL IN IRELAND.

The heart-cheering account given below is taken from a Presbyterian report, printed in the Banner of Ulster, Ireland, May 21. It is a carefully-prepared official document, from which we extract several paragraphs. The account reminds us of the great revival in the days of the Wesleys and Whitefield.

Shortly after the beginning of the present year, the Lord was pleased to convert a family near Ahoghill, and to bless their conversion in a large degree for promoting the conversion of others. An extraordinary interest began to be awakened; prayer-meetings multiplied—crowds flocked to these refreshing streams—no ordinary houses were able to accommodate the eager multitudes that assembled to hear the burning prayers, and listen to the plain, but heart-stirring addresses of the converted brethren, and those ministers and laymen whose hearts the Lord moved to engage in this important work. The open field or the public wayside, even the cool evenings of spring, were the scenes of deeply interesting meetings, over which angels hovered with joy. The prayer-meeting held in the First and Second Presbyterian Churches were crowded to excess, although held on the same evening, and at the same hour. For several miles around multitudes flocked to these meetings for prayer and exhortation. One by brethren from Connor, at the first gave, and continues from time to time still to give, a powerful impetus to the good work. Never, in these localities, was there such a time of secret and public prayer. In all directions prayer-meetings have sprung up, and that without number. They are conducted in a manner of deepest solemnity, and with a burning earnestness for the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, and for the conversion of souls.

These meetings have been signally honored of the Lord. The Spirit has descended in power. Through the instrumentality of the word and prayer, convictions—often the most powerful even to the convulsing of the whole frame, the trembling of every joint, intense burning of heart, and complete prostration of strength—have been produced. The arrow of conviction pierces the conscience, the heart swells nigh to bursting, a heavy and intolerable burden passes down the spirit, and the burdened, burning heart, unable to contain any longer, bursts forth in the piercing cry of distress, saying, "Lord Jesus have mercy on my sinful soul." This is alike the experience of the old and the young—of the strong man and the delicate woman. Under such convictions the heart finds relief in pouring out its cries and tears before the Lord. These convictions are followed by hours of kneeling before the Lord crying, confessing sin, begging for mercy, and beseeching to the Lord to come to the heart. This is done in tones of deepest sincerity, and in utterance of the most impassioned earnestness. It may be days, or weeks, or even months, with convictions returning more or less powerful in the constant exercise of prayer and the reading of the word, ere a calm and settled peace in believing is enjoyed. There does not appear to be any fanaticism manifested, any heresy broached, any self-righteousness exhibited, or any sectarianism shown.

Convictions have taken place on a large scale, and conversions have followed. Many—even hundreds—are giving the most pleasing evidences of being in Christ. Of drunkards, blasphemers, card-players, Sabbath-breakers, neglectors of ordinances, and the wicked in general, it may truly be said, "They are now in Christ new creatures." With them old things are passed away, and all things are become new. This is not an appearance put on, but, as far as yet known, a deep and abiding reality. Sin—besetting sin—is crucified. Obscene songs have given place to the songs of Zion, scenes of revelry are exchanged for scenes of prayer and praise and the reading of the word. Wild, wicked, and godless characters, whom no human power could remodel, are now to be seen sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in their right mind. They are walking with Christ, caring for the one thing needful, and living for the noblest objects of life—the glory of God. This is the case, not in solitary instances, but in hundreds—not merely with the young, just initiated into a course of sin, but with the old, confirmed in their sinful habits. Public and prevailing sins have got a powerful check. In those favored districts, where this blessed work has taken deepest root, and its transforming influence has been most widely felt, drunkenness, and Sabbath-breaking, and blasphemy, and profane language, and negligence of the great salvation, have been all but annihilated. The tone of public morals is enlightened, sanctified, and elevated. The things of God are the subjects of daily, habitual converse. Groups may be seen around our Churches, or at the corners of our streets, with their Bibles in their hands, seeking for the meaning of some portion of the Divine Word. Singing of Psalms may be heard in all directions. In many localities, profane songs or idle amusements cannot be endured. While attending the largest prayer-meetings of assembled thousands, and retiring from them at whatever hour, there is no levity, no impropriety, but an all-pervading seriousness, to be witnessed.

The means by which this blessed work is carried on are in no way extraordinary. Prayer and praise, the reading of the Word, and plain, pointed, solemn, and earnest appeals to the conscience and the heart, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, are the only means that are resorted to. These are within the reach of every congregation and every religious community.

As to the human agency by which this revival has been begun, and continues to be extended, it is not through the ministers of the Churches alone, or even chiefly. The earnest and faithful preaching of the word may have been the preparation in some degree; but the chief and honored agents in the work are the converted themselves. Not, indeed, schooled in human learning, but taught of God, very many of them have gifts of utterance in prayer and exhortation, that are powerful instruments for good. Speaking from what they feel, they have great power in awakening slumbering souls. This humble agency can be multiplied to any extent, and in any locality. The honor and success lie in this, that they are fellow-workers with God.

It is truly a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Never were our hearts so glad, and our hands strengthened in the service of God.

NAIADS OF THE SEINE.

Ouarnier's Ecole de Natation pour Dames (Swimming-school for Ladies) opens in the month of May, and it is difficult to imagine a more novel or prettier scene than it presents on a warm afternoon, for even the swimmers eschew the water at an early hour of the day; it must have been well-warmed by the sun to please them.

Neither at concert, race, nor ball in Paris have I beheld so many beautiful faces as at this school; one reason perhaps being, that many girls, from ten to fifteen, are visitors to the bath, who are excluded by their age from sharing in public amusements.

The young ladies of the "Noble Faubourg," the daughters of the wealthy "financiers," the families attached to the emperor, all meet here with the same intention—namely, to swim; and all who are able, gambol, race, and laugh in the water, forgetful of party and social distinctions. The costume is generally of some dark material, gaily trimmed with red or blue worsted binding, which does not lose its color. The upper part of the dress resembles a boy's blouse; the lower, a pair of trousers. It is all in one, and a tunic is sewn to the waist, and falls to the knee. Some of the girls go in without any kind of head-dress beyond their own fine hair, neatly plaited; others, wear nets of gay colors, or a slight netted scarlet or blue scarf, gracefully arranged.

The greater part of the swimmers are, as we have intimated, young; but ladies of all ages and sizes swim in the bath, which it is time we described.

It presents to the eye a basin about 150 to 160 feet long, and about 25 or 30 feet broad, surrounded by a broad platform, enclosed by the dressing-rooms and screened alike from the sun and public observation by an awning stretched over all. The bottom of the boat is an inclined plane, not more than two feet below the surface of the water at one end, but about twelve feet at the other. The bed of the river is artificially deepened, so as to allow the river to rise and fall according to the quantity of water. The machine is so arranged that the powerful current of the Seine rushes through it; it is, in fact, a large cage sunk to the required depth.

That part of the basin which is from four to five feet deep is crossed by a bridge; and the smaller portion thus indicated is used by those who wish to bathe only, or who are not sufficiently good swimmers to exercise in the larger one. A flight of steps leads down to the shallow end of the basin, for the convenience of those who like to walk in; other flights go down on each side of the bridge, for the use of those who know just enough of swimming to give a few strokes.

But the larger basin is the center of attraction. At the end where the water is deepest, flights of steps lead down for those who like to swim smoothly and quietly off; but far the greater number prefer leaping in, either from the platform, or from the little fanciful constructions raised at the end, which gives a descent any height you please—between ten and twenty feet.

Fearless, gay and graceful, they plunge beneath the flood to reappear almost instantly, gliding down the stream without any apparent effort; floating, swimming on the back, etc., vary the amusements, which more than a hundred ladies may be seen sharing together, their evolutions being watched and stimulated by as many lookers-on. But, alas! swimming is like every other acquirement—before the art is mastered, some disagreeable training must be gone through; many a gasp must be given, many a splashing and floundering enacted by the neophyte, in the small basin, before she is qualified to attempt a performance in the large one.

Little did I think, when I inscribed my name on M. Ouarnier's list that I should be hung on a hook at the end of a line, and then thrown into the water with directions to imitate a frog to the best of my ability; but it was even so.

The plan followed I found to be this: the stranger being duly invested with the costume de bain, is informed that there are three movements, afterwards condensed into two, that when the arms are stretched forward and outward, the legs must be closed and drawn up, and vice versa. The movements of the maitre nage cannot fully realize this on dry land; so he puts a broad girdle round your waist, and by means of a book and line, drops you gently on the surface of the water, in order that you may carry the theory into practice.

O dear, how helpless you feel! How you wish you had never thought of learning to swim! But you are ashamed to say so; you know you cannot be drowned; the man adjusts his line so nicely on the level of the water, you feel quite sure of that; so he counts "One, two, three," and you perform Froggy awkwardly enough, putting out your hands when you ought to keep them in, stretching your arms forward when they ought to be close to your body, kicking in anything but measured cadence, bobbing under water, and getting a good mouthful, notwithstanding you, silly creature, stiffen your neck, and try to keep your head up by that means. Thus ends the first lesson. When you come out of the water, they tell you, if you should feel a little stiff next day, not to mind it, and that the only way to get rid of the inconvenience is to take a lesson the next day, and the next. A little stiff? Your neck and shoulders ache again—nothing for it but to recommence the exercise of yesterday. You feel less tired this time, when you come out of the water, and have comported yourself less clumsily when in it. In fact, after three or four lessons, you are handed down the steps on that side of the bridge where the water is four feet six inches deep; the swimming-master holds a long rope in the water at the distance of three or four feet from you, and requests you to make the movements you have been taught. If they do not enable you to clear the distance between you and the pole, he hastens to advance it to you. You return to the steps, try again; and as soon as you can manage a short distance, the pole is held further from you; till, after two or three lessons more, you swim off from the steps at the end, where the water is deepest, the man on the platform preceding you with a pole as you attempt to make your way down the large basin. When you can go no further, you grasp the pole and are gently drawn through the water back to the steps to renew your efforts.

When the pupil can accomplish the whole length of the great basin under the eye of the master, she is left to perfect herself in the smaller one, where there is no danger. And when she feels she can rely on her powers, she returns to the great bath, where her first essays are made easy by the assistance of a ledge for the feet which surrounds the bath at a depth of about three feet below the surface, and which being surmounted by a rail a little above the water's edge, permits the swimmers to take rest at any point. This large basin is constantly watched either by Ouarnier himself or by the swimming-master; these are the only individuals of the male sex ever present. Madame Ouarnier, is as may be expected, a perfect swimmer, and takes an active interest in all the proceedings. [Correspondent Chambers' Journal.

METTERNICH.

Prince Clement Wenceslas Metternich, whose death is announced as having occured on the 11th, ult. was esteemed the most celebrated statesman in Europe, and his councils at one time dominated every European cabinet. He was born at Coblentz on the 15th of May, 1773, and had therefore completed his 86th year before he died. His ancestors had been distinguished in the wars of the Empire against the Turks, his family had produced more than one elector, and had filled the archbishoprics of Mayence and Treves; and his father, the Count Metternich, had obtained some reputation as a diplomatist and as the associate of Kaunitz. At the age of fifteen Metternich entered the University of Strasbourg, from which, two years afterwards, he moved to Mayence in order to complete his studies. In 1790 he made his first public appearance as master of ceremonies at the coronation of the Emperor Leopold II., and in the year 1794, after a short visit to England, he was attached to the Austrian Embassy at the Hague, in the following year marrying the heiress of his father's friend, Kaunitz.

He first came into special notice at the Congress of Rastadt, where he represented the Westphalian nobility; after which he accompanied Count Stadion to St. Petersburg. In 1801 he was appointed Minister at the Court of Dresden, and in 1803 proceeded as Embassador to Berlin. After the peace of Presburg, he was selected as the Austrian Minister at the Court of Napoleon, in which position he manifested so much ability that when the war broke out in 1809, and he had to return to the Austrian Court, which was then seeking refuge in the fortress of Comorn, he was appointed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, as the successor of Count Stadion. During his tenure of that office he concocted the idea of a marriage between Napoleon and an Austrian Archduchess, as a means of purchasing a respite for the Empire. He conducted the negotiations; Napoleon was accordingly divorced from Josephine, and Metternich escorted Maria Louisa to Paris.

In 1813 Metternich was raised to the dignity of a Prince of the Empire. In subsequent conferences and treaties the newly created Prince took a prominent part, and signed the famous treaty of Paris on behalf of Austria. He afterwards visited England, and received the honor of the diploma of L. L. D. from the University of Oxford. Although Prince Metternich received decorations from all the Courts on the Continent of Europe, he obtained none from England. At the Congress of Vienna Prince Metternich, then in his 42nd year, was called upon to preside. In 1847, when the third French revolution overturned half the thrones of Europe, he was reluctantly compelled to retire from his position. He went to England and there remained until 1851, when he returned to Vienna, but he was never again asked to undertake the cares of office.—New York Tribune.

THE ROMAN CHURCH IN AFRICA.

The Universe reports that on Feb. 25th, three embassadors of Negoussie, the King of Tigreth and Semen, had an audience with the Pope, in which they announced that their master had joined the Roman Catholic Church, and had requested them to present to the pope his written profession of faith. This is not the first time that an Abyssinian king has joined the Roman Church. At the beginning of the seventeenth century even a corporate union of the Abyssinian Church with Rome was effected, but as the people were opposed to it, it lasted only a short time. Abyssinia has been for a long time divided into several independent States. The prince who at present rules over the largest part of the country favors the Protestant mission. Négoussie, the king of Tigreh, hopes to dethrone him with the aid of the Catholic powers of Europe, especially France. His embassadors therefore proceeded from Rome to Paris. The Roman Church has at present, according to the Universe, in Abyssinia and the adjacent country of the Gallas, three bishoprics, one in Tigreh, one in the country of the Gallas, and one with the Bogos; sixty missionaries, eight churches, and more than fifty thousand Catholics. A history of the Catholic missions in Abyssinia and the Bogos, together with a history of the country in general, has been recently composed by Don Sapeto, one of the Catholic missionaries, and published by the Propaganda in Rome.

ATTEMPT TO POISON LOUIS NAPOLEAN.

The Florence correspondent of the Providence Journal, in his letter of June 10, writes:

A French officer here tells the following story. He says it has not been printed in the French journals—and certainly we have seen no such accounts—but the fact is known to the army, and the story is true. On Good Friday, if not no other time of the year, all good Catholics partake of the communion. On that day, the 21st of April last, according to his habit, the Emperor was to receive the consecrated wafer in the chapel of the Tuileries. Before going to the chapel, he was told that he must not eat the holy particle that was to be offered to him, as it had been prepared with a subtle and malignant poison for the purpose of destroying his life. The informant was a party to the diabolical secret, but horror of conscience and reverence for the Emperor led him to betray the conspiracy. The Emperor knelt at the altar during the mass, but did not eat the bread. When the office was finished, the officiating priest was invited into the apartment of the Empress to partake of a collation while the wafer was submitted to chemical examination. It was found to contain, as the informant had said, a concentrated poison. The priest is now in a fortress in Algeira. The soldier says that the priest was an instrument of the Jesuits; but whether in Italy, Austria, France or England, is not understood. So much for the story.

NARROW ESCAPE.

Bishops Morris and Ames of the Methodist Episcopal Church, had a very narrow escape from being killed on a railroad train in Ohio, last week. The train got on a bridge on fire, before the engineer saw it; an iron rail broke and threw the train off into a gully. The first passenger car, with about thirty men, women and children, turned bottom upwards, so that the floor took the place of the ceiling. Nearly every seat in it was shivered, the whole forming a confused mass of fragments. Some of the passengers appeared with bruised heads and bloody faces, and one lady's collar bone was broken; yet no one was killed, and but few crippled. The next and last car, in which the Bishops were riding, went down about eight feet, but fell on its side, and being better braced, was less broken, and none of its passengers were injured.

Two Art Veterans.—Philadelphia painters, Rembrandt Peale and Thomas Sully, the first, in his 82d, and the last in his 76th year, are engaged in painting each the other's portrait. Mr. Harrison, a wealthy and liberal gentleman of that place, has given the commission to these venerable artists. A worthy act.

Kindness makes sunshine wherever it goes; it finds its way into the hidden chamber of the heart and brings forth treasures of gold; harshness, on the contrary, shuts them up forever.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

CHEAP THINGS.

The first wish of all who have any thing to buy is, to get a good article—the best article—at the lowest price.

If such purchasers mean by this, the lowest legitimate price at which a good article may be had, perhaps the desire may be well enough; but if they mean that the best article must be cheap in reference to the amount paid for it, without any reference to the advantage to be secured by the purchase—the wish may then be wrong in theory and impossible in practice.

To wish to get a very good thing for a very small sum is very little different from wishing to get it for less than its value. This, desire, however, is generally as impracticable as it is unjust.

A good article, cheap if we can, but a cheap article any how, seems to be the ruling motto with many. Many of these penny-wise and pound-foolish people, wake up to the discovery, when perhaps too late to profit by it, that many cheap-bought things turn out to be dearest after all.

Of course we are intending our remarks for such as are able to purchase at a fair price, the best things. It is one of the miseries of the poor, for which they are to be much commiserated, that they cannot buy the best things; they must buy that which seems cheap, though, practically, it turns out to be dear—and thus, they are kept poor.

But, to proceed with those to whom we mean to apply these reflections. That man buys a cheap article of clothing as he thinks, it looks passably well; but, upon trial, it turns out that the fabric is rotten, the weaving sleezy, and the colors fade; it has not lasted half as long as a good article; it has the meanwhile looked dingy and mean, and the wearer has been uncomfortable and dissatisfied in mind. Better have paid a legitimate price for a good article, it would have proved the cheaper in the long run.

Another wants a home—he buys a tract of land because he can get it for two or three dollars per acre. He spends as much money in clearing, building and stocking such a farm as he would have done in clearing, stocking building on a tract twice as productive. What is the result? He makes five per cent. or no per cent. at all, where he might have made ten per cent. with the same labor. It turns out to be a bad investment, and, consequently, a dear purchase.

Illustrations enough for the mere material respect of the subject.

In governmental affairs the people want first class men to fill the public stations and high civil trusts; but the people only propose to give a small compensation for such services. The result is, that first class men will not accept such positions—they can make twice, or five times a much, in their private calling.

Cheap prices fill important public stations with cheap men—and thus the public interest is poorly served; and the public, in the end, pays dear enough for its false ideas of economy.

The people want superior schools, colleges and universities: but unless the people liberally endow the professorships—unless they compensate first class men as well as they can compensate themselves in other departments of honorable exertion, first class men will not accept the presidency or professorship of such institutions. Have not our judicial and literary corps been sadly weakened, and the public service seriously damaged by this ill-judged economy?

All this holds true with emphasized force in relation to the ministry. Our people, we speak now of the Methodist, have too frequently said to the Presiding Elders and the Bishop—Send us a talented and experienced minister—perhaps, naming one. They are asked—Will you give him a comfortable support? Informing them how much it will require to make a man, with such a family, comfortable—to clothe, house, feed, educate and travel them. "No, no; we can't do that!" What then? "Send us a young man, without a family."

The married man with his family—though an experienced and able minister—must locate, and enter some secular calling, to secure the simple competency the Church refused to give him; and his valuable services are to a large extent, thus lost to the Church forever.

In the meantime, the Bishop sends the young man, having no one else to send, and the Church being unwilling to support any other. He is pious, humble and devoted; but he is inexperienced, has had time to read but little, and, consequently, knows but little. What is the result? Outsiders will not go to hear him. He cannot interest them. They will not help to support him—and give as their excuse, "Methodist preachers are but inexperienced boys, unable to instruct or interest us."

Thus the character of our Church suffers; thus we are cut off from access to thousands of the more cultivated and influential class, whom we ought to reach and evangelize; and thus, the whole burden of the support of the ministry is thrown upon the membership.

Such are the unhappy results of this false and wretched economy.

People may say, perhaps people will say, ministers ought to be self-sacrificing, and care nothing about the materialities of life; but, let people say what they will, ministers will care about the comforts of their families and the education of their children; and in this, we must think they are right, notwithstanding what some of the "former day" people may say and think of us.

Let us look at this subject in a business point of view, and see if we cannot invest more wisely than many of us have hitherto done. W*.

THE DYING NEVER WEEP.

It is a striking fact—the dying never weep. The circle of sobbing, agonized hearts around, produces not one tear. Is it that he is insensible and still, already in the chill of dissolution? That cannot be; for he asks for his father's hand, as if to gain strength in the moral struggle, and leans on the breast of mother or sister, with still conscious affection; and just before expiring at ove, after a long day's converse with the "Angel of Resurrection," he says to his eldest brother—the last and his good night of earth—"Kiss me—kiss me!" It must be because the dying have reached a point too deep for earthly crying and weeping. They are face to face with higher and holier beings, with the Father in heaven, and his angel throng, led on by the Son himself; and what are the griefs of a morning, tears of a dying farewell—be it that they are shed by the dearest on earth—in that vision bright of immortal life and everlasting re-union.

"Beautiful! but not always true. The writer has seen a large bright tear gather in the dying eye, and trickle down the pale cheek, like dew from heaven upon polished marble.—Compositor.

"EXTEMPORIZING."

We copy the following from the New York Observer of the 7th inst.

In jotting down a few thoughts on this subject, I use the term under protest. It is objectionable. There is much in a name, generally, and this is no exception. We need a new coinage to give us a name for the preaching unwritten sermons. In old times they talked of preaching from "skeletons:" but this term is too grave. Preaching from a "brief" is better, although forensic. "Off hand" is an epithet which caricatures the whole performance. "Extempore" is inaccurate; and still worn, it carries a stigma in the very term. For no one wishes to listen to off-hand or extemporaneous effusions from the pulpit. A thing worth doing at all is worth preparing for; and I believe the best extemporizers are those who do not extemporize. The highest perfection of speaking is to utter premeditated thought with the ease of impromptu discourse. There is a two-fold infelicity in the term extemporizing. It creates a prejudice with sensible people, who seldom consent to hear unstudied talk. So that even well prepared thoughts are at a discount in some quarters, for the very fact that they are not read. And then shallow people, and especially aspirants after popularity, run away with the idea that the perfection of oratory is that a man should not know what he is going to say.

Good "extemporizing" is often more fully prepared than the speaker himself is aware of. A discriminating hearer said of one preacher to whom he had been listening: "He writes without knowing it." The thoughts and illustrations had been prepared, of course. And beside this, the very language of careful thinking came back to the mind and flowed from the lips in speaking. Some extemporizers study with dictionary at hand, as much as concordance and Bible; so that language is accurately arranged in the process of thinking, and then in delivery the words take care of themselves, each falling into its place as the thought is reproduced. Memory is capable of carrying its load very easily, if not too tightly girthed. It will serve us in proportion as it is trusted. Memoriter preaching would be intolerable, except to a certain class of minds. But when memory works as a volunteer, with no conscious effort, the effect is most happily produced.

It would seem that, other things being equal, extemporizing is analagous to swimming. Faith is indispensable. Nor is this a purely religious exercise. Faith in one's own buoyancy is the secret of those natural and easy movements in the water which make the swimmer. The man who expects to sink will surely do it. Doubts in his mind are like weights in his boots. So it happens that many men, from constitutional modesty and diffidence, seem incapable of extemporizing. While we see others, with the slenderest ideas, in whom we see self-confidence—we will not say conceit—takes the place of logic and preparation. But there is a normal faith in one's tongue and brain, as consecrated gifts of God—a confidence of getting along—which is indispensable to success in extemporizing. He who expects to break down will be in great danger of doing it.

The prescription would seem to be, then: first have ideas; and then let them come ont. Put the mind in that state of composure which will allow of its natural working. Preparation and courage will insure a passage, in most cases, over the shoals of an extemporaneous discourse. Neither can be omitted. It is only one in ten thousand who can safely attempt literally to extemporize But ability and material and all else being assumed, a faint heart will choke down utterance and bring the speaker down.

Hints on this entire subject are valuable. Attention is being directed to it more and more. Aside from the personal advantages of this mode of preaching—such as economy of health and labor—there is a popular demand for more life in the manner of public discourse. So true is this, that the crudest and most absurd specimens of extempore preaching will "draw;" while only an average excellency in this kind of preaching will often seem to double the efficiency of a discourse.

In comparing the manuscript with "extemporizing," it is not easy to say where the difficulty is greatest, when effectiveness of delivery is considered. It is vastly difficult to read well, so as to fall into no ruts of tone, and at length become dull. Nor is it an easier task to deliver ideas, without manuscript, so as to combine method, logic and earnestness. Gorham.

EATING-MEETINGS.

Those who knew that great man, Hezekiah G. Leigh, of the North Carolina Conference, need not be told that he uttered strong sayings. He was a "good liver," as the phrase goes, and he owned it. Once, drawing his friends around a groaning and hospitable board, he began: "Eat with thankfulness and eat enough. David thanked God because he filled his mouth with 'good things,' and so do I. I don't believe the Lord made all the good things just for fools and knaves."

But who, in the day when our venerable friend preached great sermons, ate strawberries and cream thankfully, and felt kindly to all mankind—who dreamed that by the year 1859 eating would be introduced into the social liturgy of respectable and learned sects in this practical America? The English have long had their religious tea-drinkings and their breakfast prayer meetings. Once we asked our foreign correspondent to describe to our readers how they were carried on, but he has never done it—perhaps has not been invited to one of these occasions.

The New York eating meetings were very popular last month, and well attended. Few excused themselves. The best speeches were made, dry toasts abounded, convivial nature was gratified, there were songs, and wit helped digestion. Different denominations met in representative members, and over bread, and cheese, and nuts, and cold meats, and confectionary, drew the bond of human fellowship closer, that the hook and eye of other fellowship might join. Even our Baptist brethren were almost persuaded into open communion. Those who were admitted professed to have their charities warmed and their souls enlarged.

When the Rev. Mr. Scott, an Irish Wesleyan, was in this country, his brethren of the North got up one of these eating-meetings in his honor. The quaint John Hersey, who used to walk to his preaching place because pride rode, who wore no buttons on his coat nor band on his hat because they were needless luxuries, has reproved the feasters, like another Nathan. He has written a letter about it, and wants to know if the poor, lame, and blind, were invited. Dr. Bond, of Baltimore, who was there, thus acquits himself.

"God gave us a social propensity, and a tolerable appetite, and filled the earth and sea with good things, and converted sinners and made them good company, and it would be very ungrateful not to enjoy what our Heavenly Father has so beneficently given. When the brethren of New York shall give a dinner of the kind we hope they will invite us again, and if Bro. Hersey will go and see the truth, instead of imagining evil, we are inclined to think he would not be so much afraid of 'the sword.' What a notion that is, that the good Father would fall with a sword upon his children, assembled in all innocence, around his own table, and rejoicing in him as the giver of all good! Bro. Hersey has never taken a look at God through a kitchen, garden, or a fruit tree, or a poultry-yard, or a flower-bed.

"With regard to the facts, Bro. Hersey is mistaken in an essential particular. No toasts were drunk. There was nothing but 'dry toast.' No drink stronger than coffee was furnished. To our knowledge, (though we are not sure,) we did not 'touch any unclean thing,' and as to being 'separate from sinners,' we sat between Dr. Murray (Kirwan) and Dr. Bangs.—Nash. Ch. Advocate.

THE CRITICAL POSITION OF GERMANY.

Prussia has at length been so far influenced by the demands of the minor German Courts and the roused passions of the German people as to have determined to make propositions to France, says the London Times, June 25th; the rejection of which will be followed by some decided step on the part of the Government at Berlin. We cannot say that we have been unprepared for such an event. Any one possessed of the smallest knowledge of Continental politics must have been aware from the beginning of these disturbances that the invasion of Austrian territory by France would sooner or later bring the Emperor Napoleon into some kind of collision with Northern Germany. The Prussian Regent is not now dragging his subjects into a quarrel in which they feel no concern; on the contrary, he and the other German Princes find it almost necessary for the preservation of their thrones to make some move in sympathy with the agitation which prevails throughout Germany. Whether there be time now to arrest the movement, whether the present English Government will be able to prevent the threatened rupture, we cannot pretend to say.

In this country we who are happily neutral may still look on the question with some degree of coolness. We all feel that Germany has legitimate reason to dread the opening of a new cycle of European warfare, and that Prussia and her allies are justified in demanding explanations as to the Emperor Napoleon's purpose. Neither can there be any harm in Prussia acting similarly to the English Government, and strengthening her national defense, in case the war should by any chance extend to the German frontier, or some event arise which would make it impossible for the Government to remain at peace. Our difference with the Germans in his case is as to the necessity of the demonstration they are about to make. They declare it is unavoidable; the French military ambition now roused, will never rest until the Rhine is attacked; and that it is better to meet the danger boldly and at once. The line of the Mincio, they say, is one of the defenses of Germany; and if the northern coasts of the Adriatic were once in the possession of France, it would be impossible for Germany to be sure of tranquility for a twelvemonth. To this we answer, that the dangers conjured up by the German imagination if not visionary, are at least greatly exaggerated. The French, though good soldiers, are not these irresistable beings which the Germans picture to themselves; nor can we conceive that the lines of the Mincio is really of such importance to Germany. True, the fortresses, of Verona and Mantua guard the Venetian territory, and this latter lies in advance of the German city of Trieste; but surely it is too great a refinement of diplomacy to pretend that, because a position beyond our own borders is a strong one, therefore an attack upon it is a menace to ourselves, who have nothing to do with it and would not be justified by international law in marching to its defense. But the principal matter to be considered by the Germans—and in justice to themselves and to Europe they should approach it seriously and conscientiously—is whether they can, consistently with honesty, liberality, and true policy, go to war to keep the Austrians in Italy.

When nations appeal to war, they must abide by it, and it is quite impossible that Austria, who has done her part in tearing the Treaties of 1815, can now claim, under their sanction, what she has lost by arms. How can Austrian troops again garrison Milan, except after some important victory? How can an army which is besieged in fortresses at the extremity of Lombardy, claim to return to territory out of which it has been driven, except by showing itself superior to the enemy who has for the present worsted it?

If Germany had made these propositions to France when the Austrians were on the Ticino, then there would have been some reason for this warlike attitude; but to expect that Louis Napoleon can, after two great victories, and after driving his enemy some two hundred miles before him, acquiesce in the conditions which were acceptable before the peace, is most vain. He would ask, first, why Germany supports Austria in Italy at all; and, secondly, how it is that such a policy having been adopted, the propositions of Prussia were not made while there was still a chance of their acceptance. It seems to every impartial bystander, that the interference which is now threatened ought rightfully to have taken place the first news that Austria had crossed the Ticino.

The Liverpool Northern Times, of June 25th, says: The main question that will now arise respecting the war will be as to its aggressions. A war of aggression will assuredly never be tolerated by the present neutral powers of Europe—least of all can a war aggressive in its objects, upon the frontiers of Germany, be passively submitted to by the Germanic Confederation. A people, a nation, numbering probably some seventy or eighty million souls, are not going to see their "faderland" exposed to the ruthless invasion of a foreign despot, without making a patriotic stand against it. Where, then, is this aggression to be said to begin? Is the Mincio to be considered the limit beyond which the advance of the Allies will be deemed aggressive?

Now this is a question which is becoming one of great anxiety. Just in proportion, indeed, as the Austrians are driven back upon their German territory are German fears excited, and the war-like spirit of the Teutonic race is aroused. It is true, that supposing the Austrians to be driven from Peschiera, Veronn, Mantua, and the heights of Caldiero, they may retire upon the Piave, the Tagliamento, or perhaps the Isonzo, and with the aid of the fortresses of Palma and Gradisca, situated on either side of the latter river, make a final stand for the recovery of Lombardy. But it is also probable that they may be driven from their fastnesses; and the immense siege trains which the French are bringing with them, and which they expect to transport across the Mincio, are intended for that purpose. The very least which Louis Napoleon is resolved to do is to wrest the whole of Lombardy from Austrian dominion. And when he has done this, his hosts must encamp, we suppose on the boundary of Germany. What then, will the Germans say to that? Or rather, which is infinitely more important, what will they do with such an enemy at their very door?

Prussia is evidently preparing for the resistance of further aggression on the part of the Allies, which, it is clear, any advance beyond the Mincio is deemed. The public, the national opinion of Germany, obviously regards that river as a sacred boundary for the Austrians, and considers that, however unceremoniously the Franco-Piedmontese troops might cross the Ticino or the Adda, for the purpose of driving back the Austrians, the Mincio should be treated with respect, and not passed without the permission of the Germanic Confederation. Now, therefore, is evidently at hand the critical moment for German decision. Prussia has hitherto successfully restrained the Confederation from any hostile procedure. But it is more than doubtful that it will be able any longer to do so, when once the Allies have transgressed that line of demarkation, and have set their faces direct for Germany itself.

Prussia, having at length found it expedient to mobilize her army, has thought it necessary to give an explanation of the act, in order, it would seem, to quiet the public mind of Europe. And from this explanation, although what she has done is professed to be a defensive rather than an offensive proceeding, it is yet obvious that it may very soon assume the latter character almost of necessity. "The direction," it is observed, "which Prussia follows in her internal public life, forms a sufficient guarantee for her external tendencies. And if Prussia has written on her flag the principle of the maintenance of the basis of public European law, she will have the opportunity of showing that she does not intend to favor tendencies of oppression or violence The Government is fully aware of the perturbation which the calling out of a part of the landwehr must cause in many circles of private life. But the military organization of Prussia does not give it any choice, from the moment Prussia was obliged to intervene in the regulation of the Italian question with the influence which she is called on to exercise, and which the position of the German nation in Europe requires." Now, language like this, though it may seem somewhat ambiguous, means nothing more or less than that Prussia is making ready to join the German nation in resisting the aggressions of Austria's Franco-Sardinian invaders, whenever they advance far enough to rouse the nation into action. More and more is the German mind becoming exasperated, in proportion as the Allied forces approach nearer to the German frontiers. It is the last feather that breaks the camel's back. And so likewise, will it be with those aggressions of the invaders of the dominions of Austria.

The London Daily News of June 24, says: The advance of a Prussian Army to the Rhine after a grave diplomatic disagreement with France, such as the rejection of an offer of mediation, would have a seriousness which would be incontestable. But that is not the present situation. Although the Prussian Government has announced its intentions to interfere diplomatically for the restoration of peace, it has not yet thought the time for proposing bases of pacification to France. Much remains, therefore, to be done before a case for the employment of these troops can arise. Prussia arms in order that when the time for mediation comes she may intervene with effect.

It follows what we have stated that the report of the Belgian papers respecting the terms of Prussian mediation are premature. Should the conflict on the Mincio prove a decisive character, and not degenerate; owing to the successful resistance of the fortresses into a protracted war, the diplomatic intervention of Prussia will probably follow the first great battle. Early in the week we noticed the prevalent rumor that a treaty had been concluded between Austria and Prussia with reference to the war. We are enabled to state that this report is completely erroneous.

THE GREAT EASTERN.

Scarcely two months ago, and the great ship was as desolate as a wreck, and with apparently as little chance of ever going to sea. Now the funnels are up; three masts are in and rigged; the paddle boxes are in; the engines nearly finished; bulwarks and decks complete; and a whole army of workmen are busily engaged getting forward her internal fittings. Such an amount of progress, when judged by other ships, may appear to be no great matter, but when we reflect a moment on the details and find that the deck alone requires eighteen miles of five inch planking to cover it, that the paddle boxes are of rolled iron, that each contains 24,000 cubic feet and is equal in size to a vessel of 600 tons, we begin to see that in point of labor some really astounding progress has already been made.

When tenders for finishing the vessel were first called for, in March last, the directors were dissatisfied with all, and therefore concluded an agreement with Mr. Scott Russell on the 4th of April, leaving it to that gentleman to finish the ship upon his own plans, and to fit her in every respect for sea as a first-class vessel. The contract was for £125,000 to be completed on the 4th of September, with a premium of £1,000 a week for earlier completion, and a penalty of £10,000 a week for each complete seven days beyond the allotted time. This agreement includes the masts, sails rigging, boats, cables, engines, boilers, ironwork and woodwork, with suitable accommodation for five hundred first class and four hundred second class passengers. Of course a contract so extensive is not all performed by Mr. Russell himself, but distributed in various branches among different firms which he has been in the habit of employing for his other ships.

Some of these sub-divisions include work enough to be really considered as extensive contracts. Thus the rigging will require 900 blocks, and no less than seventy nine tons of hemp rope, with thirty tons of mixed wire and hemp for the standing rigging. Her sails will consume nearly 12 000 square yards of canvas; she is to have twenty boats fitted with masts and sails complete, exclusive of the two small screw steamers each of which is to be 100 feet long by sixteen wide, of 130 tons measurement, and forty horse power. She is to carry upward of 1000 fathoms of chain cables, all of the most massive description. Her anchors are sixteen in number, ranging from one ton to seven tons (the largest). Had she been fitted with the Admiralty anchor, and had the old rule been followed of requiring a certain weight of anchor according to the vessel's tonnage, her largest anchors, must have been twenty-five tons each. By using Tratman's anchors, however, the same holding power is obtained with an anchor of seven tons.

On coming into possession of the vessel the new company thought that in case of war the Great Eastern might prove an invaluable auxiliary to the government, if not for carrying guns, yet still more effectively in running down the largest of the enemy's ships, which the immense speed of the vessel would enable her to overtake with perfect ease. For this purpose, therefore, it was decided to strengthen still more her sharp powerful bows by laying down three complete iron decks forward, extending from the bows backwards for 120 feet. These decks are entirely completed. They cover 8000 square feet, and afford stowage for 1,400 tons of cargo space. They will not, however, be used for this purpose, but for accommodating the crew of 300 or 400 men. With this large increase of strength forward the Great Eastern steaming full power, could cut in two the largest wooden line-of-battle ship that ever floated. Of the other parts of the ironwork which were contracted for at least three-quarters are already finished.

The woodwork is getting on with almost equal rapidity. All these fittings are made on shore by means of powerful machinery, and come on board ready to be at once fixed in their places. We say that the deliveries of these prepared materials prior to the 1st of June included 42,000 feet of bedings, 44,000 feet of mouldings, 40,000 feet of prepared plankings, 15,000 feet of matched battens. It requires more than six tons of paint to give one coat to the interior ironwork, and nearly eight tons to give one coat to the outside from the waterline to the bulwarks. When completely rigged she will have six masts—one foresta'sail mast of wood, three mainmasts (square-rigged) of iron, one mizenmast of wood, and one jiggermast (the last,) also of wood. The three wooden masts are already placed, and almost entirely rigged; the iron ones will be so shortly. The last mast is a single tree (Canada pine) about 130 feet high, and proportionately thick.

The foremast is a built mast, as is also the mizzen, but all the topmasts, yards and gaffs are single sticks of immense length and width, straight as arrows, and free from knots or sap. The cabins, as far as they have yet been fitted are amply spacious when compared with the accommodation offered by other vessels. The berths are very ingeniously made to fold flat against the wall during the day, and so give much increase of rooms for any who may chose to use their cabins as sitting-rooms. Both paddle and screw engines are almost completely finished and the former have already been turned by hand, and will be turned by steam by way of trial in the course of a fortnight or so. It is quite impossible by mere description to give any adequate notion of the colossal proportion of both of these sets of engines.

The paddle engines consist of four oscillating cylinders, of seventy-four inches diameter and fourteen feet stroke; each pair of cylinders, with its crank, condenser, and air-pump, forms in itself a complete and separate engine, capable of easy disconnection from the other three, so that the whole is a combination of four engines. A friction clutch connecting the two cranks is the means by which the engines can be connected or disconnected. All the sets of engines, both screw, paddle, and auxiliary, are provided with governors, expansion, and throttle valves. The paddle engines will work up to an indicated power of 3,000 horses of 33,000 pounds, when working eleven strokes per minute with steam in the boiler of fifteen pounds, the expansion valve cutting off at one-third of the stroke. All the parts, however, are so constructed that they will work smoothly either at eight strokes per minute, at twenty-five pounds without expansion (beyond what is unavoidably effected in the slides,) or at sixteen strokes a minute, with the expansion valve cutting off at one-quarter of the stroke. Under the latter circumstances the paddle engines alone would give an indicated power of 5,000 horses.

The boilers are immensely strong, and have been tested to double the pressure they are required to bear. Their weight, including donkey engine, pumps, funnels, etc., is 210 tons, and they are capable of containing 156 tons of water. Each set has about 8,000 square feet of tube surface, exclusive of flue or furnace, and about 400 square feet of fire-bar surface. Each is equal to supply freely with moderate firing steam for an indicator of 1,800 horse power when working with fifteen pounds; but with full firing can supply freely for an indicator of 2,500-horse power. The fire-places and ash-pits are fitted soas to be well adapted for the use of anthracite coal.

The screw engines are constructed on the same improved principles. They have four cylinders of eighty-four inches diameter and four feet stroke. The cylinders are capable of being worked together or separately. When working forty-five strokes a minute, with steam on at fifteen pounds, and cutting off at one third of the stroke, these engines give an indicated power of 4,400 horses, but at fifty strokes a minute, steam on at twenty-pounds, and cutting off at one-quarter of the stroke, the power will reach 6,500 horses. Thus the united efforts of both screw and paddle engines will drive the immense vessel through the water with a power of no less than 12,000 horses. What fleet could stand in the way of such a mass, weighing some 30,000 tons, and driven through the water by 12,000 horse power at the rate of twenty or twenty-three miles an hour.

The screw engine boilers are in three distinct sets. Their weight is 362 tons, and their capacity for water 270 tons. The probable consumption of coal when both engines are at full work will average 250 tons per day. The cellular compartments at the bottom of the ship will be used for pumping water into instead of ballast, and as the webs subdividing these are made perfectly watertight, any one or any number can be filled at pleasure. The trial trip will probably take place about the end of next September. No destination for this run has yet been fixed, but we would advise the directors, if they wish to maintain the great reputation the ship has already achieved with the public, not to let this matter be overlooked. A mere experimental cruise and a trial of her different rates of speed will not give the public such implicit confidence in the unrivaled capacity of the ship as if she ran between two given points—say, from Portland to Gibraltar and back. On such a trip there could be no mistake whatever as to her rate of speed, which we firmly believe will surpass even the most sanguine expectations that have yet been formed.—London Times.

AN ATMOSPHERIC TELEGRAPH.

The above, with various modifications for general use has been invented and patented by a Mr. J. Macnab, and evidently seems destined to be of great public utility. We saw a simple modification of this telegraph, for steam or other ships, working a few days ago in Messrs. W. & J. H. Jackson's patent office in this city; and we now beg to direct the serious attention of shipowners, shipbuilders, and others to the merits and applications of this most useful and unusually simple invention. Simplicity is not only a recommendation, but the working expense is literally nothing; and we understand it can be depended upon in all sorts of weather. When we mention that the agent employed is simply atmospheric air, our remarks will be obvious. Other fluids or liquids can also be adopted, we believe. In this instance atmospheric air is preferred, and two simple instruments, which can scarcely get out of order, for conveying instantaneous signals for the safe navigation of steamships or other vessels, are intended to be placed one instrument by the side of the helmsman, and the other on the hurricane deck, by the side of the captain or pilot. The two instruments are connected below the deck, out of the way, by a very small-bore atmospheric tube. A bell of small size is attached to the helmsman's instrument, and on certain given signals from the captain or pilot, or officer, the helmsman is enabled to navigate the ship in safety. In large steamships an instrument is intended to be placed also at the prow, or bow, for the lookout officer; and in the largest steamers not more than two officers are necessary to give instantaneous signals of danger or a "ship-a-head," thus reducing the liability to collision and danger from icebergs, shoals, mists, &c., and navigating the steamships or sailing vessels in perfect safety. For conveying instantaneous signals from captain or pilot to the engineer's room or captain's cabin, it is obviously of importance, from its principles being never-failing in the hour of danger, and may entirely supercede the present crude system for such purposes. In fact it answers the purposes of the wonderful electric telegraph, and has decided advantages over that system, viz: the working expense is next to nothing; it can be depended upon in all variations, of weather, and for years without going out of order. The instruments and fitting-up are almost of nominal expense in comparison to the electric system. For message purposes exhibitions have been made that the tubing and laying, which is very expeditious, would not cost much above £10 per mile, certainly a low figure; and as it is laid a few inches under the surface of the earth, it is free from all danger, and not exposed to such contingencies as the electric wires. It can be applied, we believe, cheaply for the ringing of bells in houses and hotels, and warehouses; and for railway trains it is admirably adapted, and also for relaying purposes, saving the expense of a locomotive pilot; also for communicating signals to fire-engine stations, mines, and various other uses. As it requires no attention to generate signal-agents, like the electric system, the atmospheric vessel being always self-charging instantaneously, it can therefore obviously at all times be depended upon, which is always a desideratum. We beg, therefore, to draw the attention of the scientific public and interested parties to its merits, as we have no hesitation in saying from what we have seen, that it is likely to confer advantages wherever adopted.—Glasgow Mercantile Advertiser.

THE RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPER.

Can a Church Member, meet his Responsibility without a Religious Newspaper?

The member of the Church who allows himself to live without the intelligence given in a good religious paper must be ignorant of the polity, doctrines, measures and doings of the Church to such a degree, as to have very little appreciation of his responsibility to the Church or of the obligations and privileges of a professor of religion.

It is unquestionably the duty of every member of the Church to make himself acquainted with the progress and condition of things in that branch of the household of faith, of which he is, in fact, a component part. And can it be supposed that any Church member, male or female, having the heart of a Christian, will, or can, feel otherwise than profoundly interested in all that pertains to the interests of the Church and the cause of the Redeemer? We think every one who takes an intelligent or proper view of the subject, will not only say, let there be a religious newspaper in the hand of every Church member, but place it in the hands of the masses. In no way can the pastor or missionary so much enlarge his usefulness as by awakening an interest among the people in religious newspapers.—St. Louis Observer.

CITY MISERIES.

The following is given by George William Curtis, as a picture of the life of multitudes in New York. Can it possibly be like? Would not a missionary find employment there?

And in all the streets of the great city, in all the lofty work-shops, and yards, and factories, huge hammers smote and clashed, and men, naked to the waist, reeking in dingy interiors, bent like gnomes at their tasks, while saws creaked, wheels turned planes and mallets and chisels shoved and cut and struck; and down in damp cellars sallow, ghastly men and women, wove rag-carpets and twisted baskets in the midst of litters of puny, pale children; with bleared eyes and sore heads and dirty faces, tumbling, playing, shouting, whimpering—scampering after the pigs that came rooting and nosing in the liquid filth that simmered and stank to heaven in the gutters at the top of the steps; and the houses above the heads of the ghastly men and women were swarming rookeries, hot and close and bare, with window-panes broken, and hats and coats and cloths stuffed in; and men with bloodshot eyes and desperate faces sitting dogged with their hats on, staring at nothing, or leaning their ragged elbows on broken tables, scowling from between their dirty hands at the world and the future; while in higher rooms sat solitary girls in hard wooden chairs, a pile of straw covered with a rug in the corner, and a box to put a change of linen, in driving the needle silently and ceaselessly through shirts or coats or trowsers, stooping over in the foul air during the heat of the day, straining their eyes when the day darkened to save a candle, hearing the roar and the rush and the murmur far away, mingled in the distance, as if they were dead and buried in their graves, and dreaming a horrid dream until the resurrection.

Only sometimes an acute withering pain, as if something or somebody were sewing the sewer, and pierced her with a needle sharp and burning; made the room swim, and the straw in the corner glimmer; and the girl dropped the work—and closed her eyes—the cheeks were black and hollow beneath them—and she gasped and panted, and leaning back, while the roar went on, and the hot sun glared, and the neighboring Church clock striking the hour, seemed to beat on her heart as it smote relentlessly the girl's returning consciousness. Then she took up the work again, and the needle, with whose little point, in pain and sickness and cosseming solitude in darkness, desolation, and flickering, foisting faith, she pricked back death and dishonour.

At the neighbouring corners were the reefs on which human health, hope and happiness lay stranded, broken up and gone to pieces. Bloated faces glowered through the open doors—their humanity sunk away into mere bestiality. Human forms—men no longer—lay on benches, hung over chairs, babbled, maundered, shrieked or wept aloud, while women came in and took black bottles from under tattered shawls, and said nothing, but put down a piece of money; and the man behind the counter said nothing, but took the money and filled the bottle, which were hidden under the tattered shawls again, and the speechless phantoms glided out, guarding that little travesty of modesty even in that wild ruin.

COMMENCEMENT AT MOUNT VERNON INSTITUTE—HIND COUNTY, MISS.

Mount Vernon Institute is beautiful for situation—the joy of its patrons and pupils. The Faculty consists of the President, T. M. Rice, M. A.; E. O. Eaton, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music; Madame M. E. Julius, Teacher of French and Ornamental branches; Miss F. A. Johnson, Teacher of English Branches and Mathematics; Mrs. J. A. Rice, Superintendant of boarding house.

We are glad to say that this school is successfully contributing to advance sound learning, refined taste, and Christian living. The President is a refined Christian gentleman, most happily constituted for the position he fills; his assistants are thoroughly competent and entirely satisfactory. In short, the Institution may be most unhesitatingly commended to the patronage of the public. The Commencement exercises (which I had the pleasure of witnessing) were held in the spacious Methodist Church in Clinton, about a mile from the Institute. A large audience was in attendance. The girls were beautiful; the music sweet and correct; and the compositions, sensible, eloquent, and gracefully read.

The writer spoke a speech, which somebody had the kindness to say was entirely appropriate.

After this "feast of reason and flow of soul," a large company had the comfortable duty of eating a most satisfactory dinner. May the shadow of Mount Vernon never grow less. L. B. Walker.

BATTLE OF SALFERINO.

When the details of this battle are received they will certainly prove it to have been the most sanguinary engagement on record. There are two reasons for this conclusion, the first of which is found in the character of the information already received, and the second in the fact that four days after the battle nothing like a connected report of the affair had been furnished from either camp. By a glance at the further despatch from Farther Point, which we publish to day, the reader will at once perceive the force of the first of these reasons. The victor claim to have taken 7000 prisoners, to have placed an immense number of Austrians hors de combat, to have seized flags and captured cannon innumerable, and that at a heavy loss to themselves of killed and wounded. The Austrians acknowledge their defeat, with extraordinary heavy losses, and their retreat under pressure of the allied forces. The force of the second reason will appear on a little reflection. There can be no doubt that the Emperor Napoleon would be anxious to send to the Empress and his subjects the earliest and fullest information of so great an achievement as the defeat of the whole Austrian army.—Nothing but an inability to do this can account for the Emperor's brief and unsatisfactory despatches, and that inability most probably arose from the terrible shock which his own army, as well as that of Austria, had received in the conflict, which called into requisition his utmost attention in order to reorganize it and place it in a position to retain what it had acquired as well as prepare it for new victories. While we have no account of French losses, etc., there can be no doubt that in a battle of such magnitude, and where the Austrians had so much at stake, even the victors must have suffered fearfully.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

THE POPE RELENTS FOR THE RICH.

Lord Sligo, a wealthy Irish peer, belonging to the Church of Ireland, lately desired to marry a Romish lady, who wished the ceremony to be performed by a Romish priest. The Synod of Thurles forbids mixed marriages. A papal dispensation was sought in vain, and, tired of waiting, the couple were married by a clergyman of the Church of Ireland. Immediately after, his Lordship and Lady Sligo went abroad, and, after a tour through Switzerland and Germany, they arrived at Rome. It happens that a relative of Lady Sligo is attached to the court of Rome, and, being naturally desirous that no misunderstanding should exist, he brought the case under the consideration of the Pope. His Holiness was at once pleased to order that a decree should be registered, declaring the marriage which had been celebrated in Ireland, according to the rites of the Established Church, to be, to all intents and purposes, a valid marriage, and releasing her ladyship and her family from all ecclesiastical censure.

We call particular attention to the Card of Robb, Read & Co. We can confidently state that he and his house are worthy of the confidence of our friends. There are several elixirs, tinctures, etc. principally made in the North, which, to insure a pure article, our friend Read manufactures at the Establishment, No. 108 Canal street.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Jackson Mission, Lo.—REV. J. A. B. JAMES writes: "For the past month this community has enjoyed an unusual time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Such interest as has been manifested during this time among this people, and the divine power attending every religious service, are seldom witnessed. All were compelled to admit, 'of a truth the Lord is in our midst.' 'The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.'

"On the first day of June, we commenced a protracted meeting in our Church here, which continued until the third July. It is impossible to estimate the good accomplished during such a time of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Seventy were added to the Church. The exact number of conversions I could not ascertain correctly, over thirty however. The students of Cootenary college shared largely in this gracious revival, many of them were happily converted and added to the Church, and are now "going on their way rejoicing." This abiding great usefulness in "spreading Scriptural holiness over these lands." How cheering to see young men of talent, influence, and influence, consecrating all their abilities to the cause of Christ, and actively engaging in the work of the Lord. A large number of those here to receive a liberal education, are active members of the Church—young men of deep piety, young men filled and filled in prayer and exhortation—destined, if faithful to their duty, to do important service in the elevation of fallen humanity. May the Lord of the harvest whose right alone it is send forth laborers into his harvest, constrain many of those young men to acknowledge, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Carrollton Mission, Flo.—REV. JAMES LASSITER writes: "This mission extends over quite a territory—part in Florida and part in Alabama. I commenced my labors here on the 18th of January; I found the mission almost totally disorganized; there was no plan or appointments to guide me, no stewards, and I might almost say no society or class-leaders. This circuit is bracketted on the Geneva circuit, Coffee county, Ala. We have no Quarterly meetings to help us, they are on the Geneva circuit; which, I hope, will not be the case another year, for this work is suffering greatly for want of the labors of an Elder—either local, traveling or presiding. But I am glad, after all that I can say, there is a good prospect at present in some parts of the work. I think Walton mission will make a good circuit in a year or two from this, if properly attended to, as there are parts settling up very fast.

"I have received ten on probation, twenty-three by letter, and in five new appointments; formed three new societies, will one new Church house, and expects to build two more soon. This mission would admit of enlargement; it now has seven appointments."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

By the Steamer Hungarian.

Great Battle of Solferino—The Prince of Wales returned to England—Atlantic Telegraph Company—Threatened Dissolution of Austria—Francis Joseph and the Protestants.

The following is the order of the day, published by the Emperor Napoleon after the battle of Salferino:

CASTIGLIANA, June 25th.—Soldiers: The enemy who believed himself able to repulse us from the Chiese, have crossed the Mincio. You have worthily defended the honor of France.

Solferino surpassed the recollections of Lonata and Castiglione. In twelve hours you have repulsed the efforts of one hundred and fifty thousand men. Your enthusiasm did not rest before the numerous artillery of the enemy occupied formidable positions for over three leagues, which you carried. Your country thanks you for your courage and perseverance, and mourns the fallen. We have taken three flags, thirty cannons, and six thousand prisoners.

The Sardinian army fought with the same valor against superior forces, and worthy is that army to march beside you. Blood has not been shed in vain for the glory of France and the happiness of the people."

A message from Cavriana announces that the Emperor Napoleon, on the day of the battle, was constantly in the hottest fire. General Larney, who accompanied him had his horse killed under him.

It was inferred, from the telegraphic accounts received in Paris, that the French suffered so greatly that two days after the battle it was still unable to assume the offensive.

The Austrian Official Accounts.

VERONA, MONDAY, June 25.—The day before yesterday, our right wing occupied Pazzolenza, Salferino, and Cavriana, and the left wing pressed forward as far as Guidezzolo and Casa-floffredo, but were then back by the enemy. A collision took place between the two entire armies at 10 o'clock A. M. yesterday, our left, under General Wonpea, advanced as far as Chiese. In the afternoon there was a concentrated assault on the heroically defended town of Salferino. Our right wing repulsed the Piedmontese, but on the other hand the order of our center could not be restored, and our losses are extraordinarily heavy. The development of powerful masses of the enemy against our left wing and the advance of his main body against Valta caused our retreat, which began late in the evening.

VERONA, June 25.—The Austrian semi-official correspondence contains the following: "The day before yesterday the Austrian army crossed the Mincio at four points, and came up on the superior forces of the enemy in the Chiese. After an obstinate combat of twelve hours, our army withdrew across the Mincio. Our headquarters are now at Villa France."

An official Austrian correspondence of the 27th of June says: The Emperor of Austria will soon return to Vienna, on account of important business. The command of the army, which is preparing for battle, will be given to General Hess.

A dispatch from Berne says that 4000 Piedmontese with 700 volunteers, had arrived at Piraus and advanced towards Bornio, at the foot of the Stelino Pass.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says it was expected that another battle would have to be fought before the siege operations commenced.

A dispatch from Paris states that patriotic demonstrations by the working classes in Paris was universal.

A dispatch from Vienna says that the attack of the French on Venice, and Tagliamenti, about 45 miles northeast of Venice, may be expected to take place on the 20th of June.

Accounts from Vienna state that the Austrian reserves, numbering 175,000 men, were on their way to Italy.

They are considered the flower of the Austrian army, and a few of them having served less than eight years.

The Austrians have sunk five small vessels, a large frigate and three steamers, in the port of Malmmocco, to prevent the passage of the French squadron.

PARIS, June 28.—Generals Anger, Fouey, Dieu and D'Allonville were wounded slightly at Salferino.

There will be a te deum in all the Churches of France in celebration of the victory. The Empress and all the great ladies of the court attend at Notre Dame.

PARIS, June 28.—An official bulletin to-day contains some details of the battle of the 24th. The Piedmontese were principally engaged at San Martino, performed prodigies of valor, and took formidable positions, but could not hold them, owing to a fearful tempest. They drove the Austrians from San Martino, retaining five of their cannons. Serious loss is admitted.

An English fleet of twenty sail is said to be cruising off Venice.

The Gazette de France says that preparations are made to get together within two months a force of 450,000 men.

The Sardinian Embassador at Paris is reported to have communicated to the English Government against the Secretary of the British Embassay at Paris, for anti-Sardinian manifestations.

Great naval preparations are said to be going on at Cherbourg.

The Very Latest.

The advices from Frankfort-on-the-Main state that on the 16th of June Prussia made a proposal to the Federal Diet to place a corps of observation on the Rhine, to be composed of the 8th and 8th Federal corps d'armee under the superior orders of Bavaria. The proposal was referred to the Military Committee.

The Paris Siecle and Journal des Debats ridicule the idea of German mediation on the basis which rumor has placed in circulation of so expected enterview between Prussia and Austria. It is reported that the Emperor of Austria would soon have an interview with the Prince Regent of Prussia.

LONDON, June 29.—It is stated that in consequence of but few reinforcements having been sent to India for several months, the authorities have determined to send out nearly 5000 cavalry and infantry troops.

The election for members of Parliament, to fill the vacancies of those members gone into the Ministry, were generally resulting in favor of the Government candidates. Mr. Gladstone however, was being closely pressed for Oxford University, by Marquis Chandos.

On the 28th of June the Earls of Derby and Harrowby were invested with the Order of the Garter.

A despatch from Rome announces that Ferrara, Ravenna, Forlie, Ancona, and other towns, have been replaced under the authority of the Pope by intervention of Pontifical Powers.

The news of the victory of the 25th imparted much buoyancy to the Paris Bourse, and the rentes advanced nearly one per cent; on the 27th there was a relapse, three fourths of the advance being lost; on the 28th the market opened with a still further decline, but rallied and closed at 92.30.

Trade in Paris was tolerably brisk. The Cornmarket was dull, on account of favorable harvest prospects.

LONDON, June 28.—The Daily News city article, says that the funds were weaker on Tuesday, owing to the renewed fall in the French rentes, which are prejudiced by rumors in relation to the cost of the late victory, as well as by the creation of stock arising from the new loans. Consols closed ¼ to ⅛ lower than on the preceding day.

The Times' city article says, in the absence of detailed accounts of the battle of Solferino, to enable the public to judge of its effect in predisposing Austria to terms of submission, the funds exhibited heaviness on the 28th.

It is rumored that Mr. Senor is at Vienna trying to negotiate with Austria for the sale of the eight steamers lately belonging to the European and American Steam Company, unsuccessful overtures having been made to France.

LONDON, June 29.—The Prince of Wales has returned to England.

The Atlantic Telegraph Company has issued their prospectus, inviting subscriptions to the new capital of £600,000 on the terms already made public. The Directors pledge themselves to enter into no contract without seeking the advice of the highest scientific and practical authorities of England and America.

The first operations are to endeavor to raise the old cable.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Times asserts that for the last ten years matters have been so terribly mismanaged that it will be almost miraculous if the Empire escapes dissolution.

In an autographic letter the Emperor Francis Joseph has caused ordinances relative to Protestants to be issued, without waiting for the revision of the Council of State.

By The Indiana Dates to July 6th.

From the Seat of War.

LIVERPOOL, July 6.—The headquarters of the Emperor Napoleon are now about four leagues from Peschiera.

The Sardinian army are vigorously besieging Peschiera, and the cannonading in that direction is heard at Napoleon's headquarters night and day.

The advance post of the Austrian army is but a short distance from Villafranca, which is occupied by Marshal Neil's corps d'armee.

The Austrian army is so demoralized that it is considered doubtful whether they will accept another battle in the open field.

It is rumored that 10,000 French troops have disembarked at Lossia and Peccolo (?) on the Adriatic.

The Cherso bridge at Valigio has been destroyed.

The French army, including Prince Napoleon's army corps, will operate against Verona.

A portion only of the Sardinian army are to continue the siege against Peschiera.

The Austrians have withdrawn from Bromio, and the Piedmontese troops are advancing towards the Stelvio Pass.

It is rumored at Castiglione that the Austrian army have retreated into the fortress of Verona.

A dispatch from Turin states that 20,000 of the Allied troops, now at Milan, and 10,000 from Turin have been ordered to proceed to Brescia.

There is great scarcity of provisions in the villages occupied by the Allied troops.

Movements in Germany.

The Berlin correspondent of the London Times says that the new proposals of the Prussian Government are now in the hands of the representatives of Russia and England, and that within a week the Prussian army will be in full march towards the French and Russian frontiers.

Two corps d'armee, the Time's correspondent says, will be placed so as to guard the eastern frontier against Russia, and 140,000 Prussian troops will be stationed on the lower and middle frontier of the Rhine.

When these preparations are completed, continue the correspondent, the Prussian Government will probably make proposals for peace.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

Burning of the Ravenswood on Lake Pontchatrain.

The steamer Ravenswood, Capt. Miller, a low-pressure steamer, running between New Orleans and Madisonville, took fire soon after she left Mandeville this morning, and burned to the water's edge. There were about thirty persons on board, including the officers and crew, all but one of whom were saved, a Mr. Bloom of Mandeville, who was drowned. We also learn that a negro man was lost.

Passengers from the wreck describe Mr. Bloom's conduct as being perfectly frantic. He was placed in a life-boat, in which he was unable to keep, after which he was placed on a floating platform, from which he fell into the water and was drowned.

The fire broke out in the hold. The smoke was first seen issuing from the forward hatch by one of the hands, who, on looking in, discovered that the pine wood which was piled around and under the furnace was in a blaze.

Capt. Hoffman immediately put off to the wreck and towed it to shoal water.

Later from Utah.

The St. Louis Republican publishes a letter of the 16th ult., from its Salt Lake City correspondent, from which we extract the following: A large number of apostate Mormon emigrants have left this Territory within the last few weeks. A detachment of troops under the command of Maj. Lynde, passed through this city yesterday, to serve as an escort for a large number of emigrants who were going to California by the northern route. This was deemed necessary, as the Church authorities would strip and rob them on their way, and they have had agents in the canons for weeks, demanding of the poor emigrants their tithing and dues to the "perpetual emigration fund," and when it was not paid, or the parties unable to pay it, their property has been taken from them. I know that you cannot appreciate these enormities in the States, and that it falls upon the ear dead and deaden, but you should be here on the spot, if you would wish to see the full force and effect of such tyranny.

Alabama Gold.

The Selma Sentinel says: While in Mozterallo the other day, Mr. Wheatley, jeweler and watchmaker in that village, showed us a finger ring which he had made of gold obtained from a rock gathered on Mahon's creek, just below where the Alabama and Tennessee Railroad crosses the stream. Mr. Wheatley broke up the rock with a hammer, and with his knife picked out enough of gold to make the ring, which he told us was twenty two carets fine. He presented us a piece of the gold thus obtained, which we now have at our office for the inspection of those who may be curious to see Shelby county gold.

New Lead Mine.

The St. Louis Republican of the 16th inst. says: A gentleman from De Soto informs us of the discovery of a valuable lead mine in that neighborhood. It is only two miles from De Soto, and was first discovered by Mr. Isaac Hunt. Since then with three or four hands, he has been taking out twelve or fifteen hundred pounds mineral ore per day. The vein is a very rich one, and is at present entirely accessible.

The Massacre at Perugia.

BERNE, June 29.—On receipt of the news of the massacre at Perugia the Swiss residents at Milan were ill treated by the populace, but the police interfered. The federal council has addressed circulars to the Swiss consular agents in Italy, in which the Council protests against dominating regiments, and requests that use may be made of the circulars, in order that this object may be put properly before the eyes of the people.

The Tuscan Piedmontese journals contain accounts of the proceedings of the Swiss troops at Perugia. After all resistance had ceased, the troops began to massacre the citizens indiscriminately, sparing neither age nor sex. The municipality tried to stop this carnage, and left the Town Hall with a white flag for the purpose, but they were fired on by the soldiers, and Secretary Porin, who carried the flag, fell mortally wounded.

One of the journals gives a list of the persons murdered by the soldiers after the fighting was over. Among them were three married couples, five elderly ladies, three unmarried females, the daughter of Capt. Pollodin, four years old etc. An infant was taken from its mother's breast and thrown into the Tiber. Official journals of Rome state that the Swiss officer who commanded the attack on Perugia has been promoted to the rank of General of Brigade. All who distinguished themselves are to be mentioned under an order of the day.

To the brief allusion made to the sack at Perugia, by the Papal troops in our last summary must be added the following circumstantial details from the correspondent of the London Herald: The Pope has vindicated his authority in Perugia, which, like the rest of the towns in the Legation, had pronounced in favor of Victor Emanuel. Papal dragoons were sent there; the inhabitants defended themselves with the energy of despair; but the Swiss at length entered the town, and sacked it. Perugia is a very small place, and the sack lasted two hours. The houses were gutted; women were dishonored over the corpses of their husbands, and then brutally murdered—simply because, deceived by the hopes held out by the great Imperial perturber of order, they had fancied they might do what Florence, Ancona and Bologna had done before them."

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, July 18, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 16th instant: No changes of much importance have occurred in the general market since our report of Saturday last. The transactions in nearly all departments of trade are on a limited scale, and must continue so until the opening of another season's operations in the article of Tobacco, however, it will be seen that there has been another week's sales to a good extent, and at improved prices.

On Monday, by the arrival of the steamer City of Baltimore at New York, European advices one day later were received, reporting a steady Cotton market at Liverpool, with sales on Wednesday, 28th ultimo, of 8000 bales. On Wednesday morning advices still two days later were before the public, brought by regular weekly Cunard steamer Canada, from Liverpool for Halifax and Boston, 2d inst. In the Liverpool Cotton market a decline of ⅛d per pound had taken place in the lower grades, while the Middling and better qualities were unchanged. The week's sales were 57,000 bales, and the quotations given are the same as those brought by the previous steamer, viz—8⅛d for Fair Orleans and 6¾d for Middling ditto. The total stock at Liverpool was stated at 747,000 bales, of which 655,000 bales were American. At Havre the Cotton market was buoyant, with 107 francs as the quotation for tres ordinaire. Consols had advanced, and were quoted at the close at 92¼.

Occasional light showers have fallen within the week, but generally the weather has been clear and pleasant.

The river has fallen twelve inches within the week and is now five feet two inches below high-water mark.

COTTON—Our last report left the market with a very light and poorly assorted stock, and saturday's sales were confined to about 1000 bales. On Monday European advices one day later were received, reporting no change in the Liverpool Cotton market, and the sales here on that day were about 1100 bales. Tuesday passed with sales of barely 500 bales, and on Wednesday morning the Canada's advices two days later, were before the public, reporting a decline at Liverpool, in the grades below Middling, of ⅛d per pound, with sales for the week of 57,000 bales. The further sales to our own market have been 300 bales on Wednesday, 1200 on Thursday and 1800 Friday; Thus the sales of the entire week, sum up only 5900 bales. Total receipts of the week 1547, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,652,600 bales against 1,551,550, bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 9106 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 15th inst., 33,727 bales.

The market is almost bare of the Middling and better grades, the light stock on sale consisting mostly of the lower descriptions, which are neglected and nominal.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

Pay Postage.—Persons writing on their own business, and requiring answers, will enclose a postage stamp; otherwise, they will receive no attention. This does not apply to our Agents.

What Name?—Contributions and Correspondence of whatever character, must be accompanied by the real name of the writer. Writers may publish over real or assumed names, as they choose; but, if the editor has not in his possession the real name of the writer, no communication will be published.

Free Papers.—All the Itinerant Ministers and Preachers of the patronizing Conferences are expected to act as our Agents, and will receive the paper gratis. Those of other Conferences will receive it gratis upon their proposal to act as our Agents.

Be Merciful to the Editor.—We receive, from all parts of the country, all sorts of requests and commissions, requiring attention to almost every kind of business. We have heretofore been compelled to give most of these things the cold shoulder. Hereafter, however, we are determined to have all these requests, if possible, attended to. Our clerk, Mr. H. Oliver, an excellent business man, will take them in hand, and be responsible.

Job-Work, of the finest kind, and of every variety, and in the promptest manner, will be done, if sent to the Advocate Office. Terms cash on delivery.

So. Methodist Publishing-house, Nashville, Tenn.
May 30, 1859.

We intend, as heretofore, to keep a full supply of Books of our own publication at the AGENCY of the Southern Methodist Publishing-house, at New Orleans. J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

BRO. KEENER:—Please to have the above inserted in the N. O. C. Advocate as long as you may judge proper.

Say to Bro. Parker that I desire him to act as Joint Agent with you, in place of Dr. McTyeire, resigned.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

To all Dealers with Southern Methodist Publishing-house.

To carry out fully the spirit and law of the last General Conference in reference to the sale and circulation of Books, and to accommodate as far as possible all our customers, we have carefully revised our Catalogue, and modified the prices of our publications. Our new Catalogue will be issued at no distant day. In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers Books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On Books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicated.

TO PRESIDING ELDERS OF ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Permit me to call the attention of the Presiding Elders of the Alabama Conference, to the resolution adopted by that body, requiring them to furnish the Secretary of the Board of Finance with a report of their assessment of the Conference Collection among the Circuits and Stations in their respective Districts, for record by him.

Let me make another request of the brethren. That they furnish me reliable information of all the Claimants on the Conference Fund residing in their Districts; the Superannuated, the Widows; the number of children, and their ages.

Nothing but my inability to procure this necessary information otherwise, leads me to make this request.

Any Preacher of the Alabama Conference, whose eye is caught by this notice, will confer a favor if he will furnish me this intelligence. W. E. M. LINFIELD, Sec. B. F.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

A List of Wonders.

Among the thousands of marvelous inventions which American genius has produced, within the last few years, are the following, compiled in an abstract from the Patent Office Report. Read them over, and then say if you can, there is nothing new under the sun!

The report explains the principle of the celebrated Hobb lock. Its "unpickability" depends upon a secondary or false set of tumblers, which prevent instruments used in picking from reaching the real ones. Moreover, the lock is powder proof, and may be loaded through the key hole and fired off till the burglar is tired of his fruitless work, or fears that the explosions will bring to view his experiments, more witnesses than he desires.

Doors and shutters have been patented that cannot be broken through with either pick or sledge hammer. The burglar's "occupation's gone."

A harpoon is described which makes the whale kill himself. The more he pulls the line the deeper goes the harpoon.

An ice-making machine has been patented which is worked by a steam engine. In an experimental trial, it froze several bottles of sherry and produced blocks of ice the size of a cubic foot when the thermometer was up to eighty degrees. It is calculated that for every ton of coal put into the furnace, it will make a ton of ice.

From Dr. Gale's examiner's report, we gather some idea of the value of patents. A man who had made a slight improvement in straw cutters, took a model of his machine through the Western States, and after a tour of eight months returned with forty thousand dollars. Another had a machine to thresh and clean grain, which, in fifteen months, he sold for sixty thousand dollars. These are ordinary cases—while such inventions as the telegraph, the planting machine, and India-rubber patents, are worth millions each.

Examiner Lane's report describes new electrical inventions. Among these is an electrical whaling apparatus, by which the whale is literally "shocked to death." Another is an electro-magnetic alarm, which rings bells and displays signals in case of fire and burglars. Another is an electric clock, which wakes you up, tells you what time it is, and lights a lamp for you at any hour you please.

There is a "sound gatherer," a sort of huge ear trumpet, to be placed in front of a locomotive, bringing to the engineer's ears all the noise ahead; perfectly distinct, notwithstanding the rattle of the train.

There is an invention that picks up pins from a confused heap, turns them around with their heads up, and sticks them in papers in regular rows.

Another goes through the whole process of cigar making, taking in leaves and turning out finished cigars.

One machine cuts cheese; another scours knives and forks; another rocks the cradle; and seven or eight take in washing and ironing.

There is a parlor chair patented that cannot be tipped back on two legs, and a railway chair that can be tipped back in any position without any legs at all.

Another patent is for a machine that counts passengers in an omnibus and takes their fares. When a very fat gentleman gets in, it counts two and charges double.

There are a variety of guns patented that load themselves; a fishing line that adjusts its own bait, and a rat-trap that throws away the rat, and then baits itself and stands in the corner for another.

There is a machine, also, by which a man prints instead of writes his thoughts. It is played like a pianoforte. And speaking of pianos, it is estimated that nine thousand are made every year in the United States, giving constant employment to one thousand nine hundred persons, and costing over two millions of dollars.

The Grammer School.

"Henry, have you learned your lesson?" inquired Mrs. Lincoln one evening, as she saw her son engaged in reading a story-book.

"No, mother, I don't want to, for it is a grammer lesson, and I hate it."

"O dear!" exclaimed Mary, "I wish mother would let you leave off studying grmmar; I am tired hearing you scold about it."

"I wish she would," rejoined Henry. "Come, mother won't you? I'll study all my other lessons harder, if you will. Besides, what use is there in my studying it?"

"To teach you to speak correctly, my son."

"Is that all? I'm sure I can talk well enough now, without any help from old "Bullion's Analytical."

Mrs. Lincoln was silent a few moments, and then said: "Henry, when your bed-time comes this evening, if you have made less than six grammatical errors, you may discontinue the study of grammer for the rest of the term. Mary may take notice of what you say, and write down your mistakes, and at nine o'clock we will hear the result."

"O, I thank you a thousand times!" cried Henry; "how nicely I shall get rid of it. You may be sure I shall not make six grammatical blunders in two hours."

By and by the clock struck nine, and Mary laid aside her work, and took up a piece of paper. Henry glanced at it, and thought to himself that it looked as if he had lost his chance; but he said pleasantly: "Come, Mary, I want my fate decided."

"Well," said Mary, "in the first place, you said that to-morrow James Murray was going to learn you how to play cricket. That was wrong, you should have said he was going to teach you. Then you told mother, that you done three sums wrong this afternoon."

"Yes, I remember that. I always forget to say did. That's all, isn't it?"

"No, indeed. When father came in, he asked who left the gate open, and you replied 'It was me.' Only yesterday you were learning the rule about active, intransitive, and neuter verbs requiring the same case after as before them; and you ought to have remembered it, and said 'It was I.'

"Why, I never think of saying it was I; I always say me."

"But it is wrong. A little while after, I said I had been writing three letters to-day; and you asked: "Who have you been writing to?" Now you know that to is a preposition, and requires the objective case after it; so you should have said whom."

"How many more mistakes are there on your paper," inquired Henry.

"Three," said Mary.

"Well," rejoined her brother, "you needn't read any more. I see there is need enough of my studying grammar, and promise you I won't complain of it again until I can speak correctly for an hour at least. I'll go to bed now, and get up bright and early in the morning and study. Good-night."

My young reader, how is it with you? Do you ever say you hate grammer? If so, I advise you to watch your words for an hour or two, and I think you will be surprised to see how many errors you make, even in common conversation. [Youth's Companion.]

Speak the Truth.

We are always under obligations to do right. It can never be our duty to do wrong, any more than it can be our duty to believe falsehood to be the truth.

If we have done wrong, we should repent, and confess our sins to God, and, if need be, to man.

Robinson—the boy who stands here with such a downcast face—had broken a window of this kind gentleman, Mr. Martin. When charged with the act, he denied it. He was compelled at last to confess his guilt. How much better it would have been if he had confessed it as soon as the inquiry was made! How much better still if he had gone voluntarily to Mr. Martin and made his confession.

An attempt to conceal a crime always involves the person concerned in the guilt of lying. He either speaks a lie or acts a lie; and the guilt is the same in the sight of God.

Robinson said he did not throw the marble which broke the window—he only shot it off. When he said he did not throw the marble, he was understood to say that he did not break the window; and he intended so to be understood. It was as truly a falsehood as if he had affirmed, in so many words, "I did not break the glass." The intention to deceive renders one guilty of lying. God looks at the heart.

Young persons (as well as old) should always speak the exact truth. By so doing, they will please God and gain the confidence of their fellow-men. E. F.

How Spider's make Bridges.

Some of the most distinguished naturalists in the world believe that spiders have the art of crossing streams of water on bridges of their own making. Mr. Spencer relates the following curious fact: "Having placed a large full-grown spider on a cane planted upright in the midst of a stream of water, he saw it descend the cane several times, and remount when it had arrived at the surface of the water. Suddenly he lost sight of it wholly, but a few minutes afterward, to his great astonishment, he perceived it quietly pursuing its way on the other side of the stream. Having spun two threads along the cane, it had cut one of them, which, carried by the wind, had become attached to some object on the bank, and so served the spider as a bridge across the water."

The only Son of his Mother.

The correspondent of the Evening Post, writing from the battle-field of Magenta, says: Alas, it is a sad thing to see the sacks and other equipments of the dead piled up. Letters and many little tokens of affection are taken in charge of by some of the officers appointed to that duty; but still, when so many are killed, many things must necessarily be overlooked. I picked up one of the letters that were in piles near the sack of the French soldiers that were killed, and found it was a most affectionate letter from a mother to her only son. She concluded by hoping that the Almighty would allow her to see her only child ere she died. I dropped the letter with a heavy heart, and rejoined my companions, who were ready to continue our journey on to Magenta, where the great battle, the event of real importance, had occurred.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

FAMILY PRAYER.

No man should feel satisfied with simply silent prayer. The habit of expressing your feelings through the medium of words, not only makes them distinct and clear, but it makes them strong. On the other hand, no man should pray so little as he would pray when he only prays by vocalization and utterance. There ought to be in every man's life, every day, appointed periods in which there should be utterance in prayer before God, in which a man should be accustomed to develop his feeling in actual language and words; and over and above that, and after that, there should be prayer and thought ejaculation—the uplifting of unexpressed feelings—both of them should go on together, working and co-working with each other. There are many persons who are deficient in prayer, because they never have cultivated themselves by expressing their prayerful feelings. There seems to be a difficulty in beginning. I suppose that it is always hard to speak in an unknown tongue, and to speak in a tongue we do not understand before people we do not know, brings to every one some feelings of shame. Many Christians shrink from taking up the cross of family prayer, but most unwisely are they dealt with who are dealt with tenderly upon this subject. Any man who has a family round about him, whatever it may cost in the beginning, will do wisely to take up family prayer. As to reading it from a look, every man must have his own library; it is better to rend than not to pray; but it is still better to read from your own religious experience than from any other volume. I am sure that a man who walks with crutchs is better than a man who does not walk at all; but a man who walks without a crutch is better than a man who walks with either a cane or crutch. The expressing of devout and thankful feelings before God in prayer, is one of the most needful things for Christians.

ITALIAN GIRLS.

The idea of a girl in Italy, is indissolubly connected with that of being devoid of all moral sense, infallibly proferring wrong to right, and who can only be kept from harm and evil by the most incessant watchfulness. A mother's whole maternal duties towards her daughter seem considered in Italy to be comprehended in the one act of vigilance. "My daughter has never been twenty minutes at a time out of my sight," said an Italian countess boastfully; and by this declaration she appeared to think that she merited to rank in the world's esteem with the mother of the Gracchi.

A girl belonging to the upper ranks of life in Italy, is practically a prisoner until she marries. Into society she must not enter; neither in the morning fete or in the evening dance, is she permitted to display her charms and graces. An occasional walk with father or brother, is permitted; but she must not go out of the house unless accompanied by her nearest kindred. To be seen alone even but a few rods from her father's door, would entail upon her the deepest disgrace and heaviest censure. Kept under a perpetual surveillance, every line she writes and every line she receives, are subjected to rigid scrutiny.

The girl belonging to the humbler classes of society, shares also, in a great degree, in the restrictions on her liberty. A work-girl going to her employer's house, has to provide herself with some companion; and in emergencies, I have sometimes seen a little child do the duty as a duenna for the occasion.

In the country the same rule prevails; no peasant girl is ever to be seen alone; and equally in the higher as in the lower classes of society, would any infringement of the social code in this respect be fatal to matrimonial expectations. Under these circumstances, the proceedings of unmarried English ladies excite the wonder and envy of their sex in Italy. Often have I been amused at the way in which the most common-place exploits have been magnified into heroic actions; and not unfrequently did I find myself elevated to the dignity of a heroine, when utterly unconscious that I had in any way merited the name assigned to me.—Life in Tuscany.

THE ONE THOUGHT.

A friend once told me that, amongst other symptoms of high nervous excitement, he had been painfully harassed by want of sleep. To such a degree had this proceeded, that if, in the course of the day, any occasion led him to his bed-chamber, the sight of his bed made him shudder at the idea of the restless and wretched hours he had to pass upon it. In this case it was recommended to him to endeavor, when he lay down at night, to fix his thoughts on something at the same time vast and simple—such as the wide expanse of ocean, or the cloudless vault of heaven—that the little hurried and disturbing images that fitted before his mind might be charmed away or hushed to rest, by the calming influence of one absorbing thought. Though not at all a religious man at the time, this advice suggested to his mind if an object, at once vast and simple, was to be selected, none could serve the purpose so well as that of God. He resolved, then, to make the trial, and to think of Him. The result exceeded his most sanguine hopes; in thinking of God he fell asleep. Night after night he resorted to the same expedient. The process became delightful; so much so, that he used to long for the usual hour of retiring, that he might fall asleep, as he termed it, in God. What began as a mere physical operation, grew, by imperceptible degrees, into a gracious influence. The same God who was his repose at night, was in all his thoughts, by day. And at the time this person spoke to me, God, as revealed in the Gospel of His Son, was all his salvation, and all his desire."

A READY WITTED CLERGYMAN.

The Burlington (Vt) Times tells the following story: "Dr. Cox of the Methodist denomination in Portland, Maine, is a very apt manager, especially at prayer meetings. It sometimes happens, Suhbath evenings, that his meetings draw together a few fowdies, who do not go there to pray or be prayed for. A few evenings ago, some young fellows, forgetting their good manners, were rather noisy, and not so attentive to the services as they ought to be. Dr. Cox thus addressed them: "Young gentlemen," said he. Then stopping a few moments, he continued, "I don't know as I ought to call you gentlemen, for your conduct here this evening does not merit that title. And yet I may be doing you injustice, as another clergyman did on another occasion. Having reprimanded a young man for disturbing his meetings he met the father of the young man the next day, who told the pastor he did wrong in reprimanding his son. 'Why so?' said the pastor, 'surely your son was noisy and disturbed the meeting.' 'Very likely,' replied the father, 'but he was not accountable for such conduct.' 'How is that?' demanded the pastor.' 'My son has fits,' replied the father. 'And now," said Dr. Cox, "I don't know, young gentlemen, but you may be troubled with fits. If so, I will not reprimand you but ask you to leave." The young men took their hats, and departed with flea in their ears.

THE INSTINCT OF TOADS.

A curious anecdote of the instinct of docility has come to us from a highly-veruculous quarter. In the town of Franklin, in Venango county, once lived a gentleman who was fond of bees. One morning he observed four toads sitting just below the hive. The next day the same toads were there, grave and solemn as Sphinxes before an Egyptian temple. One was black, another bright colored, a third blind, a fourth marked in some other distinguished manner. Thinking they annoyed the bees, and seeing them pertinaciously preserve their position day after day, he put them into a basket, carried them across the Alleghany, and left them at the top of a hill. What was his surprise, three weeks after, to find them at their old post, as grave and solemn as ever! Again he removed them, taking them this time in a different direction, and leaving them at a point much further off. In about six weeks, however, they were back for the second time. A neighbor to whom the incident was told, and who was incredulous, next tried to lose them. But in a few weeks the toads were seen one morning entering the garden, under the leadership of one of their number, who gave a "cheep, cheep," looking back for his suite, and then hopped on followed by the rest, till he reached his old station under the beehive, where he gravely took up his old quarters.

FALSE PRIDE.

"Uncle Jeems," writing from Charleston, South Carolina, to a country paper, notes the arrival in that city of two school teachers from the North, and remarks:

We have much available talent in the South, but I fear there is too much pride in the way. I can see no more discredit in female teaching for a livelihood than for her husband to be working for a living. There are, I fear, many young ladies of education, who, while they might be contributing to the dignity and independence of the South, by engaging in some occupation where they are needed, through they may feel ever so patriotic, allow us to seek the services of those North of us, whose interests must be more or less antagonistic to our institutions, simply because a false pride will allow them to imagine that dignity and a crust are preferable to anything assimilating to servitude. This is a great error. True dignity arises from the ashes of the spot on which we build the fires that illume and cheer, and warm the friends and offspring of those who surround us. "To do good and to communicate, forget not," is an injunction of Holy Writ; and it would be well for us to shake off our lethargy, and rise to a true knowledge and sense of our position and duty.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. LOUISA A., wife of Rev. Joseph T. Curry of the Alabama Conference, died near Fayetterille, Talladega county, Alabama, on the 15th February, 1859, in her thirty-fifth year. Her maiden name was Branner; was born in the State of Tennessee, from whence she went with her aunt, Mrs. Judge Jones, to Galveston, Texas; where she embraced religion and joined the Church, under the ministry of Rev. Robt. Alexander of the Texas Conference. Her health failing, she returned to Bibb county, Alabama; where in the month of January, 1851, she was united in marriage to her now bereaved husband; with whom she labored for the spread of her Savior's Kingdom, up to the time of her decease. Her afflictions were of a complicated character, and protracted over nine months, during which time she suffered more than human language can describe; yet, in all this, she "did not charge God with folly." At times she expressed a desire to get well, but her most fervent prayer was for a spirit of reconciliation to the will of her Heavenly Father; nor did she ever express the least doubt of her acceptance, nor the slightest degree of fear. Death had lost his sting long before he was permitted to lay his cold hand upon her life-stream. She often spoke of death as an hour of release from suffering, and rejoiced in the bright hope of eternal life. At no time, during her protracted sufferings, did her mind give way in the slightest degree—but retained its strength to the last moment. But now she is gone to her Heavenly Father's, where she will never again complain of those awful pains—and sink, and die; but, in eternal youth, she will sing his praise. She has left a broken-hearted husband, aged father, and little step-son, to mourn the loss of one so tenderly loved. May her pure spirit be their guardian angel, while they are left to struggle through this world's troubles and disappointments.

A DEAR FRIEND.

HANNAH, eldest daughter of A. J. and H. M. Paxton, died on 3d July, 1859, in her eighth year, on Deer Creek, Washington county, Mississippi. Such events are sad lessons, learned from the mysterious book of Providence. Such lessons we see through our tears, and read them with our hearts. But God is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind. Therefore,

"Why should we mourn these fading flowers,
From this low vale removed,
To bloom afresh in angels bowr'a,
By them and Christ beloved.

Thus severed from their parent stem,
Our children go before;
That our fond hearts may follow them,
To that immortal shore."

Look upwards fond parents, and not into the grave. Your daughter lives with God. Seek for yourselves a home not made with hands, in heaven; and it shall be gladdened by the angel smile and heavenly music of your beloved Hannah. Amen!

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progany that own their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrufulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, (Inalinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc. etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Cholorus or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT—A girl of 15 or 10 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic sys-t-m was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My father was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its valuable tonfold. Very respectfully yours, C. E. STARKE

TRUTH COMPLIMENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Veasey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of South Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE, Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VEASY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VEASY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing unthinkly sorrow to many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by direction, save in quantity—being afraid to give the amount of prescription I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursling infant. But to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. On the succeeding, (Monday) none was administered, but the occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st; because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation. Helmbold Extract of Buchu,

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.

H. T. HELMBOLD—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours, M. MCCORMICK

The Goddess Hygeia!

When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not in a favored few she showed the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not in the few who new claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind command she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save."
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind.
Nor Wound nor Bruise, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its sad appearance long retain.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I did it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge—we have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and as it will be—Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivaled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other nostrums designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.

The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered. parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be dependent on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviate.

Physicians generally now use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be administered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will always destroy Worms and restore the patient to health.

Save the Children.

Of the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms, or ill diseases arising from that cause. A medicine like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will infallibly and rapidly cure the disease, is therefore of immense importance to every family. It is extolled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any household to be without it. Believing that the frightful increase of deaths among children is mainly attributable to worms and the disorders they produce, we recommend this specific to all who have charge of young families.

Winer's Canadian Vermifuge.

Of all the pernicious humbugs that ignorance ever preached, the doctrine that internal worms are not injurious, is the most cruel. They are the prolific source of the stomach and bowels, and are the truthful causes of Chronic Diarrhœa and Chronic Dysentery, Inflammation of the Mesentery, Epileptic Fits, Insanity, Imbecility, Consumption and Apoplexy. In fact the disease saps the very foundations of vitality, and leads with absolute certainty, unless arrested in time, to an early death. Let Parents reflect on these undeniable facts, and remove the danger in time with that infallible preparation, which the faculty have pronounced a specific, WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

Facts for Parents.

What, in the opinion of physicians; is the most common and fatal disease of children? Ans. Worms.

What are the ordinary symptoms? Ans. A pale cadaverous complexion, dullness of the eyes, swelling of the upper lip, unpleasant breath, itching of the nose, disturbed sleep, a dry cough, fits of voracity, nausea, and general restlessness, listlessness and emaciation.

What is the safest and most certain means of relief? Ans. WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, a medicine without any mineral ingredient, mild in its operation, and guaranteed in all cases, to effect a rapid and complete cure.

Great Mortality among Children.

The papers here with speculations upon the amazing mortality among children; but they fail to indicate the true cause, the presence of worms in the stomach and intestines. At least half the fatal diseases to which childhood is subject are attributable to worms. This was the opinion of Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper. What mother, then, would risk the consequences of this terrible disorder, when a few doses of *Winer's Canadian

COAST AND ISLANDS OF AFRICA.

MR. EDITOR.—I wish to call attention through the Advocate, to the series of letters written by the Rev. W. Thomas, descriptive of the Coast and Islands of Africa, and published in the Southern Christian Advocate. I have read many of these communications with the liveliest interest. They are written in an easy graceful style, and abound in beautiful descriptions and devoted sentiments. They are generally free from the extravagance and affectation which too often mar the epistolary correspondence of our tourists. And in nearly every paragraph they breathe a simplicity, freshness and substance of truth that are refreshing.

Besides their value as a means of agreeable entertainment to the reader, and as approximating closely a true model of descriptive writing, they contain much useful information concerning a part of the world of which we are comparatively ignorant. These letters afford ample evidence of the energy and industry of the writer. His communications are not a reprint of the facts collected by other travelers. His long journey under the heat of a tropical sun, and the minute and exact description of what he saw, shows that the author still retains the itinerant's power of locomotion; and that he carried with him across the Atlantic, along the Coast of Africa and on its Islands, those noble precepts which Methodism ever gives to her sons, "Never be idle, never be triflingly employed."

The research and investigation displayed by Brother Thomas, and the graceful manner in which he has presented his acquisition to the public, give promise of success and distinction in the department of literature which he has chosen. If he continues the same habits of industry and scrutiny that mark his excursions over the Coast of Africa and its Islands, and accustom himself to use his pen, as he has done since he left those classical shores, he may, at no distant day, rank deservedly high among the tourists and descriptive writers of the age.

For the benefit of those who do not read the Southern Advocate, I quote a few paragraphs. In his first chapter, on the West Coast of Africa, in speaking of his boyish dreams, in reference to that country, he says:

"My first impression of the moors were gathered from the 'Arabian Nights,' and stories of ship-wreck and adventures among them by Adams; sobered somewhat, by later boyhood, by 'Jackson's account of the Empire of Morocco. My boyish imagination loved to revel in the midst of Moorish history, and the wilds of Moorish scenery and character.

"It was to me a land of exhaustless legend and boundless romance; in whose people—cruelty and hospitality, treachery and platonic friendship—strongly harmonized. I was early fired with the desire of seeing with my own eyes, her majestic mountains and magnificent palaces; and many a delightful day-dream have I had over an uninteresting Latin grammar—full of wild adventure, ranging from castle to tent under the shadow of a friendly Alfarben, before whose 'sesame' curtains and doors flew open."

And again, in the same letter, after hearing his guide, Mohammed, place the claims of Christ below those of Mohammed, he says:

"That night, as I read the evening lesson from the New Testament, its pages were uncommonly bright; and that dear name, which, for the first time in my life had heard assigned an inferior position among men, seemed unusually dear; may the Master himself was at hand to strengthen the faith and heal the wounded feelings of His feeble but jealous servant. In a corresponding frame of mind I once read, consecutively, one of the last passages of the Koran, and a page from the New Testament. As a philosopher in morals, I saw much to admire in the former; but in the latter, which I read as a philosopher, and also as a sinner and a mortal immortal—each verse was a burnished gem, bearing spiritual as well as moral truths. The page which contains St. John's gospel, chapter xvii., is a casket of gems, of which one single beam contains more spiritual light than may be gathered from all the philosophy of uninspired man; and which, in its harmonious beamings, reflects on the intellect and heart the shining of the Eternal Light. In turning from the one to the other, I passed from the moonlit earth and the mud-built habitations of men, to the crystal walls and pearly gates and uncreated lights of the New Jerusalem."

After this, when he stands upon the side of Teneriffe, 12,000 feet above the level of the sea, his soul full of emotion, he exclaims:

"I venerate the high mountains, for they are marked by the footsteps of Jehovah and have heard the voice of the Almighty. I love them because they have witnessed the exultation of my Savior. I delight to scale their cloud-crested heights, and stand on their silent summits, in their unveiled sunshine. I like to lose myself in that sense of immensity this unbounded prospect inspires; but, like the beholders in the transfiguration, I am bewildered by the view sublime—and, God setting limits to my utterance, sayeth, tell the vision to no man."

These passages have occurred to me, as examples of his style. They are replete with noble sentiment; and show that the author of them can not only depict a scene or describe a landscape, he can feel and interpret the subtle emotions of the heart.

I have frequently heard the wish expressed, that Bro. Thomas may republish these letters in book-form. Such a volume as he could make of them would be hailed as a boon in this place and vicinity. I am pleased to see that men of distinction are expressing the gratification afforded them by the perusal of these letters. Men in the ministry, and especially, men in the U. S. navy have also witnessed the scenes described, and have realized the feelings they inspire. I hope the author will yield to the wish so generally expressed.

In case he does so, he will of course re-write them, and make them in style and finish, as he can easily do, what the reader will expect to find under the poetic title, "Afrien and its Islands."

WHAT A BLIND MAN CAN DO.

THE Springfield Republican gives the annexed interesting account of the remarkable achievements of a blind genius now living in Ludlow:

"He is a young man, twenty-four years of age, who has been blind since he was two years old, and who does not remember that he ever saw. The circumstances which attended the loss of his vision are almost too horrible for belief, yet we have no reason to doubt them as they have been related to us. His widowed mother married a drunkard, and his step-father, conceiving a dislike against the child, undertook, when intoxicated, to put his eyes out. Going further in his diabolical purpose, he was about to thrust a red poker down his throat, when the frightened but desperate mother interfered and prevented it. The child was then thrown down a cellar, where he lay all night, taking cold, which so far aggravated the succeeding inflammation of the eyes, that the sclerotic coat of each was burnt. Of all this, he has no memory, and a blessed thing it is for him. At nine years of age he lost his mother, and in that loss became perfectly friendless. From that day to this, he has mainly taken care of himself, and now, although cheated by rascally agents, and laboring under every possible disadvantage, has money at interest!

Now let us see what this man has done. He is a mechanic, and knows every part of a steam engine as well as if he could see. He is an engineer, and has not only had charge of stationary engines, but has run as an engineer on the Mad River Railroad, in Ohio! Of course he ran with a look-out, and between this look-out and himself he had arranged a series of abbreviations of language, so that he could learn from him the position of any object on the track instantaneously. He was engineer, let it be remembered, of a passenger train! What is more remarkable than all is, that he has made a beautiful little steam engine with his own hands, so small that he can carry the whole of it in his pocket, and get up steam at pleasure. This might well be considered accomplishment enough for one blind man, but this is but a beginning.

He has a great genius for music, and possesses a voice which, in many characteristics, is without doubt the most wonderful voice in the world. On Tuesday evening of the present week he was invited to a private house in this city to give an exhibition of his musical abilities, and a few musical men and women were invited in to hear him, all of whom will bear testimony to their astonishment and delight. We suppose that all musical people will shrug their shoulders with incredulity, when we tell them that his voice has the compass of five octaves, yet such is the fact that he demonstrated to this company. Of course, the lowest notes are guttural, and the highest, falsetto; but the falsetto notes are pleasant and good and the gutturals true tones, and as pleasant as such tones can be. We are not sufficiently versed in musical terms to tell what his lowest note is, but it is the lowest note in the piano, arranged upon the musical scale—or triple C, as he calls it. His chest tones are excellent, and although Carl Formes may have more power, his quality is no better, while in lower notes he goes down "out of sight" of Carl Formes altogether. We can give no idea of his voice by any comparison, for we have never heard a voice with which to compare it.

Of course, with such a voice as this, the owner is tempted to try tricks. The most interesting of these was the application of it to several purposes. He began by singing in a delicate soprano, the first lines of "Oft in the stilly night;" then, as he proceeded, he slid into alto, then into tenor, then into base, and then into the "double base;" an octave below. This finished the tune, when he arose, and turning his back to the audience, executed some excellent feats of ventriloquism, and wound off by imitating an old-fashioned spinning wheel so perfectly that the assembly was thrown into roars of laughter. He usually accompanies himself with a melodeon, to which he has added a swell of his own invention that produces all the effects of the swell in the organ. One of the most delightful of his performances was a solo on the cornet: he playing it with one hand, and accompanying himself on the piano with the other. Upon this instrument, and in this way, he played a few airs with great sweetness and taste, and executed some very difficult variations. The instrument itself has been the subject of his improving hand, but in what respect we do not know. Added to all this, he plays the guitar and other instruments, and is a leader and teacher of bands! He seemed to take a great deal of interest in explaining his steam engine to the company, and to be thoroughly versed in mechanical matters.

This man's name is W. A. Carns. He was born, we think in one of the Western States, and has lived where he could get a chance. He is of medium height, thick set, modest in demeanor, interesting in conversation, and has received an education in some asylum for the blind, for which he now appears unboundedly grateful. He is now engaged in the invention of some means by which the blind may be enabled to have their regular newspapers, and if anybody can accomplish so benevolent a result he will do it.

THE FALL OF JERUSALEM.

THE following description of the fall of Jerusalem is taken from the celebrated work of Rev. Geo. Croly, in which the Jew "Salathiel" is represented as giving the description. There is a grandeur, solemnity and beauty prevading the whole, that produces in all who read it a mingled feeling of awe and admiration:

The fall of our illustrious and happy city was supernatural. The destruction of the conquered was against the first principles of the Roman policy; and to the last hour of our national existence Rome held out offers of peace, and lamented our frantic dispositions to be undone. But the decree has gone forth from a mightier throne. During the later days of the siege, a hostility, to which that of man was a grain of sand to the tempest that drives it on, overpowered our strength and senses. Fearful shapes and voices in the air, visions startling as from our short and troubled sleep; lunacy in its hideous forms; sudden death in the midst of vigor; the fury of the elements let loose upon unsheltered heads—we had every terror and evil that could beset human nature; pestilence, the most intolerable of all, in a city crowded with the furnishings the diseased, the wounded the dead. Yet, though the streets were covered with unburied bodies, though every well and trench was teeming with them, six hundred thousand corpses lay flung over the rampart, naked to the sun; pestilence came not, for if it had come the enemy would have been scared away. But the 'abomination of desolation,' the pagan standard, was fixed where it was to remain until the plow had passed over the ruins of Jerusalem. On this fatal night no man laid his head on his pillow. Heaven and earth were in conflict. Meteors burned above us; the ground shook under our feet; the volcano blazed; the wind shot forth in irrisistable blasts, and swept the living and the dead in whirlwinds far in the desert. We heard the bellowing of the distant Mediterranean, as if its waters were at our side, swelled by the deluge. The lake and rivers roared, and inundated the land. The fiery sword shot out tenfold fire. Lightning in immense sheets of intensity and duration, that turned the darkness into more than day, withering eye and soul, burned from the zenith to the ground, and shattered the summits of the hills.

Defence was not thought of, for the mortal enemy had passed from our minds. Our hearts quaked for fear; but it was to see the power of heaven shaken. All cast away the shield and the spear, and crouched before the descending judgement. We were conscience smitten. Our cries of remorse, anguish and horror, were heard through the uproar of the storm. We howled to the caverns to hide us; we plunged into the sepulchers to escape the wrath that consumed the living; we would have buried ourselves beneath the mountains.

I knew the cause, the unspeakable cause, and the last hour of crime was at hand. A few fugitives, astonished to see one man among them not sunk into the lowest feebleness of fear, came around me, and besought me to lead them to some place, if such were now to be found on earth. I openly counselled them to die in the hallowed ground of the temple. They followed and I led through the streets encumbered with every shape of human suffering to the foot of Mount Moriah. But beyond that we found advance impossible. Piles of clouds whose darkness was palpable, even in the midnight in which we stood obscured the holy hill. Impatient, and not to be daunted by anything that man could overcome, I cheered my disheartened band, and attempted to lead the way up the ascent. But I had scarcely entered the cloud when I was swept down by a gust that tore the rocks in a flinty shower around me. And now came the last and most wonderful sign that marked the fate of a rejected Israel.

While I lay helpless, I heard the whirlwind roar through the cloudy hill, and the vapors began to revolve. A pale light, like that of the rising moon, quivered on the edges, and clouds rose rapidly, shaping themselves into the forms of battlements and towers. The sound of voices was heard within, low and distinct, yet strangely sweet. Still the lustre brightened, and as the airy building rose, tower on tower, and battlement on battlement; we knelt and gazed on this more than mortal architecture, that continued rising and spreading, and glowing with a serener light, still, soft and silvery, yet to which the moonbeam was dim. At last it stood forth from earth to heaven, the colossal image of the first temple; of the building raised by the wisest of men, the consecrated to the visable glory.

All Jerusalem saw the image, and the shout that in the midst of their despair, ascended from its thousands, told what proud remembrances that night have hushed the world beside. Never fell on my ear, never on human sense, a sound so majestic, yet so subduing; so full of melancholy, yet of grandeur and command.

This vast portal opened, and from it marched a host such as man had never seen before, such as man shall never see but once again; the guardian angels of the City of David! They came forth gloriously, but with woe in all their steps; the stars upon their helmets dim; their robes stained; tears flowing down their cheeks of celestial beauty. "Let us go hence," swelled upon the night, to the uttermost limits of the land. The procession lingered long upon the hill. The thunders pealed; and they rose at the command, diffusing waves of light over the expanse of heaven. The chorus was still heard, magnificent and melancholy, until their splendor was diminished to the brightness of a star. Then the thunder roared again. The cloudy temple was scattered on the wind, and darkness, the omen of the grave, settled upon Jerusalem.

FARMER'S DAUGHTERS.

MISS L. VIRGINIA SMITH that was, says the N. C. Advocate, Mrs. French that is, the crinoline editress of the Southern Homestead, gives the following excellent advice to farmer's daughters. Although intended for rural districts, it is applicable to young ladies whose fathers are not farmers.

A young girl who happens to be the daughter of a real genuine farmer, should consider herself particularly fortunate. Her position is one which contains all the elements which go to make a lofty character, it is calculated to bring out all the energies, to develop all the natural gifts, and in time, with proper guides, to make her one of the greatest women in the world. If there be in life one situation above all others where the daughter may grow up healthful, beautiful, useful, graceful, intelligent, and pure, that situation I believe to be as one of the household band in the home of the honest and independent farmer or planter. I would say to young girls whose lives have fallen in such "pleasant places," do not undervalue your peculiar advantages. You are the "highly favored among women." The circumstances in which you are placed are such as are best calculated to develop your powers in a threefold form, physically, mentally, and morally. I would have you value your advantages, improve every one of them to the utmost, and place a proper estimate upon yourselves. You have every opportunity to make yourselves noble, beautiful, intellectual, and useful women; do this then, and each in her own person, assert the dignity of labor. Consult your parents, and form for yourself a purpose in life. They place before your brother some aim, some standard, some goal which his exertions are to reach; why not then give you something to live for also? Why should you be the only cypher in the family? When you have finished school, don't for one moment believe that you are educated. Don't dress up in your six flounces, etc., and sit down on the parlor sofa, waiting for that young clerk at Ketchum & Cheatum's to call round. No, let him show off his laces, embroideries, etc., etc., and wear them too for all you care about it.

Remember, that let others do as they will, as for you, you have something else to do than to sit down, fold your white hands, and wait to be married. You have an influence in society to wield, duty as a daughter, and perhaps as a sister, to perform, and then you must not forget yourself, for you have a mind to be cultivated, health to be guarded, a heart to be educated, and an immortal soul to be saved. Is not this a great deal of work? Yes, trust me, if you only go about it with a will, you will find every moment employed, and every day too short for the accomplishment of all your duties. You know how much you can assist mamma in all her varied departments of domestic economy, the dairy, the poultry-yard, the store room, the sewing basket, the garden, the shrubbery, and twenty other things over which her watchful eye presides—but, while doing all you can for her, please don't neglect papa. Now I see you smile incredulously, saying to your nice little self. Why, what in the world could I do for papa? O! a great deal, if you will assume the responsibility. Besides preparing some refreshing delicacy when he comes in, as he expresses it, "hungry as a hawk," or singing him a sweet song when his mind is over-tasked, you can talk with him, and learn of him about his fields, his stock, or his buildings; you can read to him his agricultural books and papers, for there is a good deal of head work in farming, and thus improve your own mind while adding also to his knowledge. Suppose, then, that some day, he is called off on important business, though it is in the hurry of harvesting, he quietly takes his seat in the cars, and goes on his way rejoicing. Ah! squire, glad to see you, but how in the world did you get up to town? this is your business season is it not? The old man smiles, a deep light flashes in his blue-gray eyes—is it pride, or love?—as he quietly replies: Yes, sir, it is, but my Mary will attend to that. O! wouldn't you glory in that? I would.

I can see no necessity in the world for your troubling yourself about marriage, but if Harry Thornton, that intelligent, handsome, and successful young man will keep on coming to consult your papa about this or that, always contriving, by the way, to terminate his consultation with a ride, or a tete-a-tete with papa's "Mary, why then you needn't be surprised, on some fine evening, to hear yourself "respectfully solicited" to become Mrs. Harry Thornton. Then I wish you to remember that marriage is only a question of will with you, not a necessity; your good parents are not at all anxious to get rid of such a sweet, sensible, brave, and beautiful child; and you, if you don't think you have a call to become a wife, have been too well educated to fear the name of "old maid." But if you love Harry, and your will is won, (which for his sake, poor fellow, I trust is the case,) then like an honest, dear little girl as you are, having far too much love for your lover, and too much respect for yourself to "flirt," say "Yes, immediately; and heaven bless you both.

THE BATTLE OF SOLFERINO.

THE New York Times, of the 12th, publishes a letter from the battle field of Solferino, giving the first details.

The battle commenced a little before five o'clock, in the morning. Just back of Castiglione rises a high range of hills, which projects a ridge or thereabouts into the plain, and then breaks off towards the left into a wide expanse of smaller hills, and so into the rolling surface which makes that portion of the plain.

The Austrians had taken position upon these hills, planting cannon upon those nearest to Castiglione, which they could approach, (as the French army was in full force and around that little village,) and had stationed their immense army all over the surrounding plain. As nearly as we can now learn, the Emperor Francis Joseph had collected here not less than 225,000 troops and commanded them in person. His evident purpose was to make a stand here, and risk the fortunes of the war upon the hazards of the day.

Napoleon promptly accepted the challenge, and commenced the attack as soon as it was light this morning, by placing cannon upon the hill still nearer to Castiglione than those held by the Austrians, and opening fire upon them on the heights beyond. He took his own stand upon the highest of these, a steep, sharp-backed ridge, which commands a magnificent view of the entire circuit of the plain, and from that point directed the entire movements of his army during the early portion of the day. The French very soon drove the enemy out of the posts they held nearest the town, and followed them into the small villages in the plain below. The first of these was Solferino, where they had a sharp and protracted engagement.

The Austrians dispute every inch of the ground, and fought here as they did throughout the day with the utmost desperation. They were three times driven out of the town before they would stay out. The people of the village, moreover, took part against the French, upon whom they fired from their windows, and the French were compelled, in self-defence, to burn the town. When the Austrians found it impossible to hold their ground any longer, they fell back slowly and steadily until they reached the village of Volta, directly southeast from Castiglione, and is only about a mile from the river Mincio, from which, however, it is separated by a range of hills.

Upon these hills, in the rear of the town, and overlooking it completely on the South and Southwest sides, the Austrians had planted very formidable batteries, and when I arrived upon the field and went at once to the height where the Emperor had stood at the opening of the engagement, but which he had left an hour before to follow his victorious troops, these batteries were blazing away upon the French, who were stationed on the plain below.

The general result was soon made evident by the slackening of the Austrian fire, by the falling back of the smoke, and by the corresponding advance on the part of that which rose from the French artillery. The cannonading at that point lasted over an hour, but in precisely what direction the Austrians retreated it was not possible, from the position I occupied, to see. Part of the Austrian force probably crossed the Mincio river, which flows Southward to the Po, but the battle continued to rage all over the region Northwest of a line connecting the towns of Castiglione, Solferino and Volta.

At one point after another a sharp cannonading would arise and continue for a half or three-quarters of an hour, and after each successive engagement of this kind, the result became apparent in the retreat of the Austrians and advance of the French forces.

During all the early part of the day the sky had been clear and the weather hot, but clouds began to gather about noon, and at five o'clock, while the cannonade was at its height, a tremendous thunder storm rolled up from the Northwest. The storm lasted for about an hour, and the cannonading, so far as we could distinguish, was suspended. Then the rain ceased, the clouds blew away, and the sun shone out again, and the air was cool and perfectly delightful. Though the cannonading may have ceased for a time to take part in it, the fight had meantime gone on, and when I again resumed my post of observation from which the storm had expelled me, the cannonading commenced quite on the extreme left of the entire field, northeast from Castiglione, and west of Peschiera. The Piedmontese troops under the King, who commanded them in person, had been posted there and received the Austrians as they came around.

From about seven o'clock until after nightfall an incessant and most terrible combat was here kept up. The batteries of the two armies were apparently about half a mile apart, and at the outset they were both served with nearly equal vigor, but the Austrians gradually slackened their fire, and several times took up new positions while the Sardinians poured a rapid and uninterrupted shower of balls upon them, suspending only for a few minutes at a time, and then renewing it with redoubled fury. The sun had now gone down, the air was still and the sound of musketry, as well as cannon, was distinctly heard; sometimes only a single flash would be seen, then two or three at once and sometimes half a dozen would break forth in instant succession.

It was beginning to be dark when I turned to descend the hill, and all the way down still heard the roar of cannon, and the clattering of the guns of the infantry. The Austrians have sustained an overwhelming defeat, and it seems to me not unlikely that the Emperor may now be induced, by the representations of the neutral powers, to accept the peace which Napoleon will be very likely to tender him.

I am afraid to venture upon any conjecture as to the number killed and wounded in this battle; but, from the nature of the case, it must be enormous. I am confident that not less than 10,000 wounded have been brought into this village alone during the day, to say nothing of those that were left on the field or taken to other places.

THE FRENCH FIELD TELEGRAPH.

A WAR correspondent, dating from Brescia on the 4th of June, reports a fact which has not hitherto transpired, concerning the scientific appliances of electricity to war purposes. It would appear that the remarkable precision and unity of the French evolutions were accomplished by quite a novel sort of aides-de-camp. From each corps, once in a position, a horseman rode off to the next division, unrolling on his rapid course a light wire, which no time was lost in adapting to a field apparatus; and the process was repeated all along the French line of twelve miles. Hence the movement of the whole army was known and regulated like clock-work, "from dawn to dewy eve," on that decisive day. This arrangement had been planned in Paris, and a supply of gutta percha-covered metal thread forwarded with secrecy and dispatch. It has done its work and the patent may now be disclosed. Portable galvanism beats portable gas. It was already known to both armies that a special telegraphic corps operated in the rear of the allies, and laid wires as fast as an advance was made. M. Lair is the chief engineer, and the first Frenchman who entered Novara, while the Austrians were scarce yet out of it, was M. Ganthier of that staff, who set up his box and telegraphed the details of the retreating corps at the moment they were outside the gates. Lonato, Montechiaro and Castiglione were in instant communication with Brescia and Milan when evacuated by the foe on the 23d.

THE TURCOS.

WE CONDENSE from the gossip of our Eastern exchanges the following description of this body of troops:

By the side of the soldiers of the Imperial Guard is to be seen the Turcos, whose ferocious aspect almost alarms the Nocrese. They are a race entirely apart—Africans by birth, French by adoption; they accept with the best grace in the world the exigencies of discipline. I yesterday visited their encampments; there is nothing at the same time more serious and more grotesque than their manners. The Arabians and negroes have their tents; but they sleep outside them, discipline not exacting from them any abnegation of the open air. When the hour calls them to dinner, they fell an ox and distribute the meat reeking hot; the Kabyle does not even wait till his ration has been thrown into the soup pot, but eats it raw—it saves time. When the enemy is mentioned in their presence, they grin, show their white teeth and flash fire from their eyes. "I perceive," said I to an officer, "you have good confidence in them." "Yes," was his reply, "I fear only one thing for them—i. e. cavalry; as for infantry or artillery, they will walk straight to the cannon's mouth; but a man on horseback scares them out of their senses." On their arrival at Novara they made a regular onset on the barber's shops, and the tonsors of Piedmont could not execute their calling half fast enough for them.

An account, written after the battle of Magenta, of these Numidians, who for the first time since the expedition of Hannibal have found themselves on the other side of the Alps, says: "It is declared that the conduct of the Turcos at Magenta was a pendant to the Zouave's attack at Montebello and Palestro. An eye-witness assures me that their attack presented a spectacle at once curious and terrible. They did not run, but some crawled, like the savages described by Cooper, and seized their enemy ere they had time to stir; others bounded into the plain, uttering yells, and fell upon the astonished Austrians, hitting about on all sides with their bayonets without pity or quarter. A horrible melee was seen. The thunder of cannon was overwhelmed by the cries of a wild harmony which was neither the song of victory nor the lament of the wounded or dying. All that the language of Mokammed contains in the way of curses and imprecations issued from their throats by volleys at a time, and one Turco did not hesitate to attack three or four Austrians. To the cries of the officers responded the trumpet and drum, and every instant clouds of the enemy were seen despoiling themselves of their guns and throwing themselves into ditches or ravines to escape pursuit.

When the struggle was over the spectacle was hardly less strange. The frantic conquerors rolled themselves on the earth, as though some African music sweeping across the Mediterranean had suddenly met their ears; they executed frenzied dances and broke out into bursts of laughter which really terrified their companions in arms. Some had compelled their prisoners to sit near them, and, like the lion which fascinates his prey, they contemplated with an eye full of fire the unhappy defenceless soldiers at their feet. All savage as the Turco is, he fights loyally, nobly; seldom does he strike his adversary behind, he flies rather in his face, at his head; he bounds, he cries, he galls, he confounds his enemy, but never cowardly attacks him by surprise. He makes a prisoner of his disarmed foe—but he never attempts to injure him.

NAPOLEON AT HEAD-QUARTERS.

THE Journal de Rouen publishes the following extract from a letter from the camp at Montechiaro, dated the 24d of June the day before the late battle:

If I had been able to write to you the other day I should have sent a letter, which would have been a true picture of a day with Napoleon III, at the army of Italy. It was the 17th, at Travagliato, the day we entered Brescia. The Emperor had taken up his quarters at a large farm house inhabited by the mayor. Just imagine a spacious yard; on the left the dwelling-house, on the right a large garden, separated from the yard by a railing. The yard is crowded with traveling carriages and wagons. The Emperor's attendants and the people of this farm are passing and re-passing. It is six in the evening; the Emperor comes down from his room attended by Marshal Vaillant. The whole military household comes out and stands apart. The Emperor sits down and a map is brought to him. Marshal Vaillant presents several papers to his Majesty. The Emperor remains alone for a moment, and rests his elbow on another chair beside him. A spy arrives and is introduced. His Majesty listens to him, but apart. A colonel is called; he gives ten napoleons to the spy, who seems well satisfied with his pay. Marshal Regnault de St. Jean d'Angely arrives; the Emperor converses with him. Other generals come in. The map is called for several times. The King arrives in a carriage, and the two monarchs shake hands. Soften down a little the hectoring air which some portraits give to King Victor Emanuel, give him a very plain cavalry uniform, and you will have the portrait of Victor Emanuel. You must also darken his complexion a little, give greater distinctness to his features, so as to have the true physiognomy of a frank soldier, used to the life of camps. The Emperor and he go a little apart and converse, both making cigarettes in rapid succession. The Emperor, tired of standing, leans against the shafts of a wagon close by; the conversation is lively and long; other generals come in. The light, though now declining, is still sufficient to allow of seeing the man who is again brought forward. At last, the King left at ten o'clock, and the Emperor dismissed his household; a quarter of an hour afterwards he returned to his apartment. The Emperor eats little. He sleeps more by day than by night. He works till one in the morning, and is called up again at three or four.

FISH NESTS.

IT WAS not known until lately that any of the fish build nests. But the Frenchmen are always prying into such matters, and one of them lately discovered a fish called the Shotslebuck at work. He brings all the materials in his mouth, of course in very small quantities at a time, and frequently from very considerable distances. It is very instructive to observe his contrivances for preventing the foundation of his structure from being carried away by the stream, which he effects by bringing sand, also in his mouth and placing it upon the successive layers forming the foundation of his edifice. His next process is to cement these layers well together, by a gluten which he obtains from his own skin, by rubbing himself against them; and thus is formed the floor upon which the rest of the structure is to be raised. It is occasionally further secured at its anchorage by a root or twig at the bottom of the stream, or by some other neckbutial assistance. His next process is to stick small, or occasionally stronger materials as uprights, all around the foundation; frequently taking them out with his mouth, and putting them in situations more to his fancy, till he is at length satisfied that they are all in the right places. Sometimes he finds a portion of his materials altogether unsuitable, in which case he takes it away to a distance from the intended nursery of his offspring, and regardless of labor and fatigue, gets another lot of materials. He cements the walls as they arise, by rubbing against them as he had done to the floor, and then sets about the roof, which he completes in a similar manner. His hardest work appears to be this cementing process; the vibrating of the body, by means of which he exudes the necessary mucus from the surface of the skin, seeming to exhaust him very much. He makes two openings to his dwelling, a front and a back door as it were, which he retains in suitable form by passing continually through them in such a manner as to keep them neat and open.

THE CORK OAK. (QUERCUS SUBER.)

THE Cork Tree bears a general resemblance to the broad-leaved kinds of Quercus Ilex, but when full grown it forms a much more handsome tree. It is cultivated extensively in Spain Portugal and the South of France. The outer bark, the great thickness and elasticity of which is owing to an extraordinary development of the cellular tissue, forms the cork, and is taken from the tree every eight or ten years; there is also an interior bark, which is left on to protect the tree, so that stripping off the extra bark is so far from injuring the trees, that it is necessary to their continuation; for trees that are never barked are said to die at the age of fifty or sixty years. The bark is taken off for the first time when the tree is about fifteen years old; it soon grows again, and may be re-barked three times, the bark improving every time, till the tree attains the age of thirty years. After being detached, the sheets or tables are flattened by presenting the convex side, or by pressure. In either case it is charred on both surfaces to close the transverse pores previous to its being sold. The carbonized surface produced by this charring may be seen in bungs and taps; but not in corks, which, being cut in the lengthway of the wood, the charring is taken off in the rounding. It was used as sandals by the Greeks, whence our cork soles. The poor people in Spain lay broad planks of it by their bedside to tread on, as we use carpets and rugs.

They sometimes line the walls and insides of their stone houses with the bark, which renders them warm, and corrects the moisture of the air. Both in Spain and Barbary beehives are made of cork, for which it is excellent, being a non-conductor of heat. For this purpose they roll the bark into a cylinder five or six feet long.

The acorns are sweeter than common acorns, and have been eaten as human food in cases of scarcity. Hogs eat them greedily, and get rapidly fat on them, while they produce a firm and savory lard. The Spaniards eat the acorn roasted. It grows readily wherever the live-oak (Quercus virens) will grow, and much more rapidly. It forms a very handsome evergreen tree, twenty to thirty feet high, and is quite ornamental. It is excellently adapted to the climate of the Southern States.—American Cotton Planter.

THE INDIAN GOVERNMENT AND HINDOO TEMPLES.

AS AN instance of the evil arising from the Indian government taking into its own hands the management of lands, the proceeds of which are devoted to the endowment of mosques and temples, I will narrate what came under my observation not long ago. At a Hindoo temple on a hill, not far from Mehabuleshwar, there is a mango tree, which, according to native belief, miraculously bursts into leaf within the space of about a quarter of an hour. To witness this, a vast number of people assemble yearly, when offerings are made to the temple connected with the said tree, greatly to the profit of the resident Brahmins. Happening to be near this spot, my servants asked me to attend on the grand occasion. I went with them, and found crowds of people surrounding the tree, which was completely bare of foliage. After a great deal of noisy music in the temple, the priest gave out the eventful hour had arrived, when two or three Brahmins ascended the tree, and pretended to search for the wonderful blossom. At last one descried it; it is plucked by him. He then descends, and is borne slowly on men's shoulders to the temple, showing a very small sprig to the credulous as he is carried along. "Now, sir," says one of my Hindoo servants, "are you not satisfied of the truth of what you yourself have witnessed?" "No," I replied, "not at all; the priest must have brought the blossom from some other tree." "Well, sir," said he, "every one knew this to be no deception; besides, your own government acknowledges the same, or why is it that a yearly sum is allowed for the maintainance of the temple?" Of course, I explained that the grant must have been originally made in perpetuity by some native prince, and consequently our government continued it; but the man's remark must speak for itself. LONELINESS OF GREAT CITIES.

THE vaster the crowd the more solitary the individual, the more lonely the heart. "No one," says a recent writer, "is known in London; it is the realm of the incognito and the anonymous. It is not a place, but a region or a State. There is no such thing as local opinion in the metropolis; mutual personal knowledge there is none; neighborhood, good repute, bad fame, there is none. No house knows the next door. How is a man to show what he is, when he is but a grain of sand out of a mass, without relations to others, without a place, without history, without distinctiveness? Crowds pour along the streets; and although each has his own character written on high, they are one and all the same to men below."

This is true, though, of course, in a less degree, with every great city, especially to the young and unfriended stranger. All at once he passes from the midst of a friendly neighborhood—where every one knows one another, where the eye of every one is on his brother, and where the slightest incident of weal or woe affecting any of its members is the theme of interested converse around each cottage hearth—to almost an absolute solitude. In fact, in those vast wildernesses of streets, and lanes, and noisesome courts and alleys, of which the lower parts of our great cities consist, while the worst vices of social life are generated to the utmost, society in the true sense of the word can scarcely be said to exist. There are few or no ties of mutual knowledge, common interest, and friendly neighborhood, such as bind the inhabitants of a country side or of a small town together, and which make a parish not a district merely, but a living organized society.—North British Review.

ARTIFICIAL RELIGION.

WHEN Archdeacon Hare first visited Rome, some of his Protestant friends, it is said, who knew his love of art and the personal sympathy which he had with the Eternal City, trembled for the effect it might produce upon his mind. These fears were groundless. Rome was all and more than all he had imagined. But the splendid vision left him. "I saw the Pope," he used to say, "apparently kneeling in prayer for mankind; but the legs that kneeled were artificial; he was in his chair." Was not that sight enough to counteract all the aesthetical impressions of the worship, if they had been a hundred times stronger than they were?

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, JULY 20, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

Not a Case of Yellow Fever has occurred in this city during the present season.

The Editor returned from his trip to Georgia on Friday morning last—dashed off a few paragraphs for the paper—and left at five o'clock in the afternoon to attend the Commencement at Centenary College, at Jackson, La. He will be at his post in a short time.

MR. HILLIARD'S UNIVERSITY ORATION.

It is known to our readers, probably, that this distinguished preacher and statesman was invited to deliver the annual address, we believe, at the recent Commencement of the University of Virginia. A correspondent of the South Carolinian gives the following account of the effort:

I could not resist the temptation to pause one day, en route to see the gala day of the Virginia University, especially as I understand that the chief circumstance of the day was to be a speech from Mr. Hilliard, of Alabama; and most amply have I been compensated for the detention. It was indeed a great day. I saw the University in its highest moral and physical paraphernalia, in the midst of its glorious landscape of green fields, blue mountains and sentinel villas, from that which dominates high up on Monticello, to billows which are half hid, half revealed to view amid the folds of hills and valleys that nestle along under the Blue Ridge. I have rarely seen in the wide world so glorious a prospect as that which enraptures the eye from the top of the rotunda of the University. I don't know that I should class it among the minor merits of Mr. Jefferson, his selection of so lovely a site for his great institution. The buildings have an imposing extent and grandeur. The noble hall in which the beauty and the chivalry of the State were assembled to hear Mr. Hilliard's oration, was crowded to its utmost capacity, decorated, I must say, with a somewhat too elaborate ornamentation; but the magnificent copy of "Raphael's School of Athens," filling the entire space of each end of the hall, unperceived and dimmed the glitter of festoons and tinsel somewhat profusely disposed about. Right in front of this great picture was the elliptical platform, the place of dignity, on which sat the visitors (trustees) of the University, the professors and the officials of the occasion, and those entitled to places of distinction.

Mr. Hilliard is a tall, handsome, intellectual looking man. His presence was greeted with tumultuous demonstrations. I had seen him before, but he looked better and younger than some years since. His presentation to the audience was graceful, and the very first sentence enchained attention, which, for the hour that he spoke, did not relax an instant, except amidst thunders of applause. It was a superb oration, classical as became the scene, graceful as became an accomplished artist; fervent, as I take it in his temperament. There were traces of Herculean thought, acute and profound, results of much reading and reflection, brilliant illustrations from a prolific imagination. The audience was seized and wrapt and entranced, led in delightful subjection, going on with a perfect tribute to his high, noble and conservative sentiments, until, by a natural but unexpected stroke of art and power, he denounced the re-opening of the slave trade, a burst of applause broke from the multitude like thunders from a cloud near by, and resounded, not only through the hall, but far in the distance.

The success of the orator was perfect. In all the highest qualities of eloquence, Mr. Hillard surpasses Mr. Everett. In the elaborate, artistic qualities of rhetoric, one might suppose that Everett would be superior; but if so, art cannot equal the inspiration of nature, especially in that portion which is the soul of oratory. As I came out of the hall, I was curious to catch the judgment of the crowd. I heard gentlemen, whom I had seen on the stage, say this surpasses Everett, and this was my judgment. It was a grand oration superbly pronounced. I felt that the sceptre had been wrenched from the hands of the North, and all the more gracefully done, that the speaker accorded to the North a full measure of the high merits which belong to it.

REV. JOSEPH CROSS, D.D., AND MRS. CROSS.

Rev. Joseph Cross D.D., passed through this city last week, en route for Texas, whither he goes for the purpose of assisting, as a member of the itinerant host, in spreading Scriptural holiness over that broad, and beauteous land. He will find there men inured to the toils of the itinerant ministry, strong in the faith of the world's conversion, and especially zealous for the westward progress of the "Church in the wilderness." They will give him a Texan welcome, as they have done the gifted Boring. Much land there is to possess in that direction—more than is conceivable by those who have not traveled west of the Mississippi—and we rejoice at every accession to that ecclesiastical "army of observation" now moving on to the Rio Grande and to the Pacific.

The Doctor is too well known, as an accomplished Christian gentleman and eloquent preacher, to need any commendatory introduction to our brethren in Texas. It is enough to say, that his brethren of the South Carolina Conference give him up with great reluctance, as their resolutions in Quarterly Conference at Spartanburgh, show. His last position there was the Presidency of the Spartanburgh Female College.

Mrs. Cross, whose charming letters from Europe enriched the columns of some of our Advocates, year before last, will follow him to Texas in a short time. We imagine that the society of the Lone Star State never rejoiced in a more valuable acquisition. The blessing and good wishes of thousands follow her wherever she goes. She goes to Texas to engage in the excellent work of female education. Highly accomplished, and largely experienced, she has but few equals in qualification and aptitude, for the sphere.

We are happy to inform our readers that we have made a permanent engagement with Dr. Cross, and through him, with his "better half" ("better" in the literary sense, too—we beg the Doctor's pardon—no we do not—he is pleased with the superiority of the wife, as every good husband ought to be) to write regularly for the Advocate.

REV. WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN, D.D.

We learn that Dr. Wightman was on his way from Spartanburgh, South Carolina, his present residence, as President of Wofford College, to Greensborough, Alabama, to make arrangement to remove his family to their new home in September next, preparatory to taking charge of the "Southern University." This new and important Institution is to be opened on the first of October.

The Trustees of the University, according to our humble judgement, have been exceedingly fortunate in the selection of its President. Dr. Wightman is not only a finished scholar, and possessed of those excellencies derived from enlarged literary culture, but he is, in person, manners, and spirit, a most accomplished gentleman—an elegant illustration in himself, of that style of manhood which is the glory of the South, and the attainment of which should be promoted by all our Southern Male Institutions. But, better than all, he is a devoted and spiritual-minded Christian. Although his reputation as a preacher has for a long time been a most enviable one, his friends say he has never preached with such unction and power as within the last two years.

His brethren in South Carolina, where he has labored from his youth and where his life has been a blessing, regret to part with him, and follow him with their prayers and blessings.

NEW BOOKS.

The French Revolution of 1789. As viewed in the light of Republican Institutions. By John J. C. Abbott. With 100 Engravings. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers: 1859: 8vo.

In the words of the author, "It is expecting too much of human nature to imagine that the struggles of an oppressed people to emancipate themselves from feudal despotism can be impartially narrated in the castles of nobles or in the Courts of Kings." The republican stand-point from which he views the scenes of that great struggle, the glowing rhetoric which characterizes his style, and his unequaled power as a writer of evolving order from an apparent chaos of historic material, are a guarantee for the readable interest of this work. Nearly every page presents an engraving of the places and events of the History, and the work is gotten up in the best style of the Harpers.

The Wars of the Roses; or, Stories of the Struggles of York and Lancaster. By J. G. Edgar. With Illustrations. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers: 1859: 12mo.

Whatever can be done is being done to relieve the old records of the 15th century of their dust and dryness. It is not now necessary to seek for thrilling narratives in the terrible pages of Rinaldo Rinaldini, and the Romance of the Forest; but to learn by the clear statements of history, that truth is stranger than fiction. By the labors of such writers as Mr. Edgar, the youths of our day are beguiled into a knowledge of History. Their fathers, when boys read it, and took calomel and jalap with pretty much the same relish.

Cicero De Officiis. Libri tres: With Marginal Analysis and an English Commentary. By the Rev. Hubert Ashton Holden, M. A., late Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. First American Edition. Edited by Charles Anthon. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1859.

The Notes and Comments are so exhaustive as to be no small part of a translation. A work finely suited to those who are disposed to keep up their knowledge of Latin, by daily readings of the great Orator. 12mo.

Elementary Grammar. Designed for General use in Common Schools. By Wm. C. Fowler, late Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. New York: Harper & Brothers: 1859: 16mo.

The continual announcement of new Grammars is an evidence of the difficulty of learning how to speak the English language correctly; we therefore hail every book which proposes to aid in this great work with good wishes for its success, and promise ourselves the pleasure of benefit from its teachings.

The Queens of Scotland. By Agnes Strickland 8th volume: Harper & Brothers: 1859: 12mo.

John Halifax, Gentleman. By Miss Muloch. Harper & Brothers: 1859: 12mo.

Walter Thornley. By the Author of "Ailen Prescott." Harper & Brothers: 1859: 12mo.

The above noticed books are laid on our table by H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp street, New Orleans.

BISHOP PIERCE ON THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The following letter we take from the Pacific Methodist of 24th ult.

Mr. Editor: Having but a few days since reached your State by the Overland Mail route, I have thought it might be interesting to your readers, and perhaps to the citizens generally, to say a few words in relation to the trip. In this view I have been confirmed, by finding on my arrival that the people are no little excited on account of a reduction in time proposed by the Post Office Department. My own judgment is, decidedly, that the commercial relations and social interests of the East and the West imperatively demand that the line should be increased to a daily one. It seems to me to be a necessity on the Pacific coast. The present line has pioneered the route—demonstrated not only that it is practicable to transmit the mail and passengers, but has done it under all the disadvantages of an incipient enterprise, with a regularity unsurpassed in the history of staging. No line in the old States is more punctual or reliable. A daily stage would not only greatly multiply the facilities of travel (a desideratum in this case), but would increase the security of the route, stimulate intercourse between States, induce settlements along the line, and in time fill up the mighty void between the East and the West.

I will not annoy you with the details of my journey, as my only object is to commend the overland route to the traveling public. The general impression seems to be, that none but the most robust can endure the dust and heat and toil of such a trip. I confess I encountered it with some apprehension, especially in behalf of Mrs. P. and the daughter who accompanied me. The experiment, however, has satisfied me that it is safe, and tolerable for any but the sick or the very infirm. The distance is great, but the road generally fine—never bad; the fare poor, scanty, and irregular; but the traveler may relieve this evil by filling his own satchel with "good things;" water is scarce oftentimes—rarely good when obtained—but there is enough to prevent suffering. The crossing of the Gila and Colorado deserts is the most unpleasant; this, however, consumes but a day or two, and may be effected without serious discomfort.

On the other hand, the scenery is varied, picturesque—now beautiful, now grand; never monotonous. Those who dream of vast solitary plains, over which they are to roll without change of scene, will be greatly surprised to learn that from the Colorado, in Texas, to San Francisco Bay, they are never out of sight of mountains—most commonly in the very midst of them. Walled in by those towering hills on every side, as you rush down a cannon or roll through a valley, the question will often occur—how am I to get out of this prison? Wait a little; double yonder point, and instead of being compelled to climb up to the rugged summit around you, you will find a pass of smooth surface and easy grade, and opening out upon a level vale.

One great relief to what otherwise would be the weariness of the journey, is the speed with which you travel: the ordinary rate is from seven to ten miles the hour. The consciousness that you are getting along—going ahead—forestalls tedium. On the whole, I think it a very pleasant jaunt; expect to return this Fall by the same route, and would recommend it to all who are fond of novelty and adventure, or who have a fancy for the wild, the solitary, the lovely and the sublime. No American can have an adequate conception of the vastness of his country till he traverses the mighty West, even to the Pacific coast.

It may be proper to say that I did not come from St. Louis or Memphis, but took the San Antonio and San Diego stage at San Antonio, Texas, and connected with the Overland line at El Paso. The whole passage consumed twenty-four days. If the speed of the San Antonio line were equal to the Overland, the distance might be passed in seventeen days with great ease. The mail may be carried from San Francisco, to New Orleans, with great regularity, in twenty days, and such a line ought to be established. To reduce the present facilities of inter-communication, would be not merely a local injury but a national calamity. I hope the remonstrances which have gone up from all the military posts along the way, and from the people of Texas, and which I see your own State (the most deeply interested party) is preparing to make, will arrest the proposed change, and at least continue the present order of things.

This much in favor of the great Overland Mail Route I feel to be due to the East and the West, and to the contractors who have inaugurated a great enterprise—itself the pioneer of a greater.

ITEMS FROM THE BATTLE FIELD—ITALY.

A correspondent of a London paper, writing from Cavriana on the 28th June, says: The plain of Guidezzolo, is realy horrible to look upon. Even so late as yesterday the dead were not all buried. They were to be seen in groups of twenty or thirty in one spot, where a shell had exploded or the Zouaves had passed. The dead remained in the attitude in which the death stroke had left them.

People of different races, and those even inimical to each other, were found closely commingled. The headless body of a Croat resting against and hemmed by the blood of an Hungarian. Two lads of not more than sixteen were lying in each others arms, as if in dying, they had clung together in a last embrace. A dog was seen standing by the side of a Bohemian officer, as if guarding him in his sleep, little aware that that sleep would know no waking.

On every side was death—ghastly, and in every terrible aspect which it could wear.

It was a dear bought victory, imagination can picture nothing more revolting than the scene presented the morning after the battle, and yet there were the victors pitching their tents among the piles of dead, part of which, buoyant with life, had been their comrades but the preceding morning.

It is impossible to tell accurately the loss experienced by the contending armies. It is stated that the Austrians lost 20,000 killed, wounded and prisoners. Of the Piedmontese 200 officers are hors de combat, and from 5,000 to 6,000 men. The French compute their loss at 12,000. The loss of the contending armies is computed at 40,000 men.

Though the Emperor of Austria was on the field of battle, yet General Hess directed the operations and was the real Commander-in-chief.

General's Benedict and Urban, directed the operations against the Piedmontese. The Emperor Napoleon keeps the French as much as he can in ignorance of the losses his army has sustained, still the truth will leek out through private letters. One states that a regiment which entered the field 2,000 strong—lost 500, another regiment in the same brigade was so cut up that it cannot take the field again, till completely reorganized.

In the attack against Solferino, the fire of the Austrians was most destructive, but the answering fire of the French was so effective that the batteries had to renew their gunners several times.

In the first ambulances of Solferino and Castiglione, there are from 6,000 to 8,000 wounded Austrians. The medical staff of the army gave proof of the greatest courage and devoteness. Numerous dressings were made by the surgeon's of the regiments under the fire of the enemy, and the removal of the wounded was made with the most perfect order.

The Austrian Retreat.—The Emperor went not far to the rear, leaving his staff at a farm-yard on the road to Volta, he turned back with a chosen few, and looked on whilst a last effort was made to fight for the possession of Cavriana. The last effort was made, but to no purpose; nearer and nearer fell the French shells, till one actually cracked over the head of the Emperor and another burst in the middle of his staff. The order for a retreat had in the mean time been carried out, the Emperor and the Archduke retired by a cross road to Valeggio, the first army began to withdraw towards Mantua; his was done with little difficulty, as an Austrian corps still held Guidezzolo, which stopped the progress of the enemy. The second army however, experienced heavy losses; the centre of the Austrian positions having been forced by the occupation of Cavriana.

The material of the Austrian army, was however saved by the speedy construction of flying bridges on the river below Volta. As night fell, the Austrians remained in possession of Monzambano, Vallegio, and Guidezzolo.

The son of Lieut. General Baron Eynatten, the Chief of the War Department, was deprived of his sight during the battle, by a bullet which passed close by his eyes; the poor young man is recovered, but in total darkness.

Although the French have had heavy losses to sustain, the Sardinians in proportion to the number of troops engaged have been still greater sufferers, their loss is estimated at 9,000 killed and wounded. Of one regiment only seven remained unwounded; and of one whole battalion only seventeen escaped unhurt.

Kossuth arrived on the 22nd of June, at Genoa; and the following day proceeded to Turin. He was received by great demonstrations of delight at Alessandria, and addressed the crowd in Italian. After two interviews with Count Cavour at Turin, he set out for the headquarters of Prince Napoleon. When he arrived at Parma, the people were making preparations for the reception of Prince Napoleon, so he came in for a share of the ovation.

Russian Military Movements.—Several detachments of the first army of Russia under Prince Gortschakoff have been placed on a war footing; as has also the fifth corps of the second army at present in Bessarabia; officers on half pay who had not served in the Crimean War, are permitted to resume active service.

An armistice has been agreed upon by the belligerent powers; and it is possible that a congress may be called to decide the fate of Italy. But it is not likely that Sardinia after sacrificing so much to gain possession of Sunny Lombardy will relinquish her design; nor is it probable that the Emperor, who is still in possession of the strategic part of Lombardy, and who has an army of more than 200,000 men, will yield those rich provinces without a further struggle, which have been held by the German Emperors with little intermission for nearly six hundred years. Should Kossuth renew the war in Hungary, supported as he probably will be by France and Sardinia and secretly abetted by Russian emissaries, Austria will find it difficult to maintain her high position.

We observe that the French Emperor has sent back the wounded Austrian officers and the Emperor of Austria has announced that he will return wounded prisoners of the allies.

BATTLE OF SOLFERINO.

The London Times, says, it is singular that we are indebted to the vanquished for all our reliable information as to the circumstances of this great battle. Not only is the Austrian bulletin the most candid acknowledgement of a defeat ever given to the world, but it is also the most satisfactory history of a battle ever put into the same number of words. By the light of these seventeen lines of print and a tolerable map, one can almost see the situation of the combatants and the great features of the engagement. The grounds upon which this battle was fought differs much from the spongy plain through which the Austrians had been so long retreating, and the French had been so long advancing. The southern end of the Lago di Garda consists of hills and broken uplands, which have always been considered as favourable to defensive operations. When the Austrian Emperor changed his tactics so suddenly that the command to recross the Mincio appeared rather the result of a caprice than a deliberate judgment it was into these uplands that he led his army. The village of Pozzolengo, which he describes as having been occupied by his right wing, is about six miles to the south-west of Peschiera. Solferino, which played so important a part in the battle, is a little village about six miles to the south-west of Pozzolengo, and is situated at the foot of the uplands, and just at the point where they descend into the plain. Away to the left across the plain, another six miles distant, is that Castel Goffredo which we are told was occupied by the Austrian left wing. Here we have the line of battle. The three places are nearly equidistant, and from a straight front, in a south-westerly direction, from the Garda Lake. Moreover, the line is as nearly as possible of the length which the French Emperor mentioned in his message to the Empress. Its right extends over the highlands from Pozzolengo to Solferino. Its left passes along the plain from Solferino to Castel Goffredo. Solferino is the centre and the key of the position. Behind these three points lies a second line of posts marked in the despatch, and important in the events of the day. Guidezzolo and Cavriana are the villages that afford this second line of stations; and Volta, also mentioned in the telegram, is a town about four miles in the rear of that second line of posts, and within a very short distance of the western bank of the Mincio. We have thus the Austrian order of battle and distribution of force perfectly indicated. What the French positions may have been we can only conjecture. They probably formed a line which would have Castiglione for its centre. As the Austrians say that their left wing advanced beyond Castel Goffredo and nearly reached the banks of the Chiese, it is probable that the allied force was principally concentrated in the higher district which approaches the shores of the Garda Lake. The Austrian line seems to have advanced in a crescent form, pushing forward its wings from Pozzolengo and Castel Goffredo with great energy and some success, and attempting to force forward their centre along the slopes of the uplands towards Castiglione. Here, however, they were met and defeated, Solferino, "heroically defended," was at last carried by the French troops. The Austrians had extended their line too far even for their immense force. Having thus lost the key to their whole position, the Austrian centre must have been forced back to the village of Cavriana, four miles in the rear. They must again have been dislodged by the pursuing French and Sardinians, and again must have retreated upon Volta, six miles still further to the rear. Volta is, we believe, an open town, and the Austrian centre, which now occupied it, was ten miles in rear of the position it had held in the morning. The French were following up their success, and were preparing for an attack upon Volta with their main body. If this should succeed, the Austrian army must be cut in two and entirely routed. The Austrian Emperor therefore called in his wings, now so greatly in advance of his centre, and drew off his entire army; not, however, retreating very far, but, as it would appear, retiring only to the bank of the Mincio, which, after Volta had become his central position, was close in his rear. Next day he crossed the river, and we have now the significant announcement that General Hess takes the command, and that important business requires the presence of the Emperor of Austria in Vienna.

The most wonderful part of this battle—and indeed the most wonderful characteristic of the whole campaign—is, that the Austrians when beaten were allowed to evacuate the field of battle without pursuit. Whether this is moderation or policy or necessity on the part of the French Emperor we cannot yet tell. Nor can we tell whether he looks upon this Austrian army as a sportsman looks upon the game in his preserves, and manages them with a design of getting as many battues out of them as possible, or whether it has always been a chance—happily decided in his favour, whether he should drive back those obstinate Austrians, or fall himself in the effort. Napoleon III. keeps his own counsel too closely to let Europe know this interesting truth. It appears certain, however, that when the Austrians were content to retreat, the contemplated attack upon Volta was suspended, and the advance of the French ceased. Was it the bridge of gold to the flying enemy, or was it the accord of peace to the beaten and yet abiding foe? We cannot quite comprehend the restraint of the French upon this and other occasions, except upon the supposition that they had good reason for avoiding any further conflict at that particular moment. But, whatever may be the determining cause of these tactics, it certainly is not the want of any personal enterprise on the part of the French Emperor which has allowed the Austrian army to remain unbroken after this defeat. He has shown himself to be as personally brave as any one of his own Grenadiers, and we must not cavil at the steps of progress which are so leisurely but apparently surely mounted. We should rather look forward with interest for tokens of that moderation in vicinity which, after all, must test the ultimate prosperity of even this most prosperous of men.

FRENCH MOVEMENTS IN COLONIAL WATERS.

We are in receipt of St. John (N. B.) papers of the 11th, and Halifax papers of the 6th inst. The Halifax Sun, in the course of an article on the management of affairs in the Colonies, under the direction of the British Government, remarks:

"French men-of-war, in usual numbers, are making their appearance in the Straits of Belle Isle and on the coasts of New Foundland, and it is quite apparent that what the Emperor regards as essential to the extension of his naval power is to be obtained by a demonstration. The Americans got all they wanted by sending Com. Shubrick and a single old steamer on our coast, and the French will not be backward in coming forward to demand all that they require, in the most courtly style, but with a significant number of guns and New Foundland fishermen turned into men-of-war's men. That the Emperor will demand all that he considers essential, and that he will get it, whatever it be, is our firm belief. Great Britain, when she surrendered our Fisheries, declared to all the world that she would not go to war with the United States for anything British-American. She will, or we are much mistaken, make the same declaration in favor of France before negotiation is over. We set but little value on the proceedings of the commissioners who are now engaged, it is said, in attempting to adjust the point in dispute. If they yield all the Emperor desires, which they probably will, there will be an end of the matter. If they do not, a few frowns and demonstrations will carry the point in dispute, as surely as similar points were carried by Shubrick's war steamer.

"There is no concealing the fact, that the prevailing sentiment in England, and all over the British Empire, at this moment, is apprehension of the audacious counsels and over-weening power of Louis Napoleon. In diplomatic language he is our ally. Nobody feels that he is our friend, but he stands in a position of vantage, to command any concessions in the far off Provinces of the Empire he may see fit to claim. Of course a demand to occupy one of the Channel Islands on the coast of Cornwall would be resisted at all hazards. But Belle Isle, and the coast of New Foundland, what Englishman would fight for them any more than he would for the inshore fisheries on the coast of Nova Scotia?

We think that we are safe in predicting therefore, that sooner or later, the French will have their own way, and that all the gas which we may expend in the meantime, will produce about as much effect as was produced in the settlement of the North Eastern Boundary line by Henry Bliss' pamphlets, or on the Fishery question by James Unlucke's orations. In every negotiation, conducted by Great Britain since the Revolutionary War, British America has been victimized, either by the presence of foreign powers, or by the ignorance and incapacity of those in whose diplomacy our interests were entrusted. So it will ever be until North America, united, strong and vigilent, enters upon the diplomatic field, with the will and determination to guard her own interest."

HOW GEN. ESPINASSE DIED.

The circumstances accompanying the death of Gen. Espinasse being diversely reported, we believe, it our duty, says the Paris Presse, to Publish the following narrative, borrowed from a letter of a general officer who was present at the action:

On the third June, about four o'clock, P. M. General Espinasse crossed with his division the Ticino over the bridge of Turbigo. The fourth, at ten in the morning, he received orders to proceed quickly to Magenta, passing by the village of Buffalora. There, at about three o'clock, he found the enemy in considerable force, and began a first conflict, which was very severe. The second brigade of his division took the main part in the fight and captured from the Austrians two flags, one of the ninth line which Col. Schmidt had carried to her Majesty the Empress, and the other so badly torn that it was impossible to distinguish of what number it was. It was four o'clock when General Espinasse rallied his troops and resumed his march on Magenta, a large village of 6000 population, where the enemy rested his right, and where he had massed a number of battalions. All the houses were riddled with holes, all the streets barricaded, all the approaches swept by the cannon; the four Churches, their towers, the railroad depots, presented a formidable defence. To the eyes of those accustomed to war, the success of the day was insured.

Gen. Espinasse caused the charge to be sounded, and threw himself foremost in a large street which led to the railroad depot. Welcomed by a shower of shot our troops got possession of the pieces in an instant, covering the interval with their bodies, necessary to arrive there. The horses threatened every moment a charge over the soil bathed in blood. "Let us dismount," said Gen. Espinasse to Gen. Castagny, who followed, and both placed themselves at the head. A house occupied by more than 500 Austrians did our men considerable injury, all their efforts being employed to secure the great door, which was strongly barricaded. Gen. Espinasse motioned with his sword to his Zouaves towards the first story windows, and called to them to break them in, when a ball coming from those very windows, struck him just below the right hip, passing through the body from side to side, and passing out, bruising his left arm. He uttered a loud cry, throwing his sabre high in the air, and fell dead in the arms of Gen. Castagny.

PANDEMONIUM LIKELY TO CONTINUE.

The Bulletin says: War, as a general rule, is one of the most awful evils that can come upon a country. The amount of crime and vice, and desolation, the number of blighted hopes and broken hearts that it causes, the rankling hatreds that it engenders between nations that otherwise would never entertain them, the paralysis that seizes upon the very vitals of industry, the increase of taxation, the despotism and grinding hardships to which multitudes for the time being are subjected, the poverty and starvation which generally follow in its train, all go to make it a monstrous thing, never justifiable except by considerations overwhelming and vital to the substance of the happiness and independence of a people.

A great majority of the wars that have been waged in the world, and that have deluged it in blood, have been undertaken and carried on from motives and considerations worthy of fiends rather than of men. In reference to what we may say, therefore, as to the effects of this cessation of hostilities, we trust we shall not be suspected of a secret desire for their continuance. Our view of the war is simply as to its actual probabilities. These we think are that no peace will be made during the armistice, but that the belligerents will come in conflict again, and try the fortunes of more battles.

This conviction arises from what we think the allies had in view when they undertook to give battle to Austria, and the settled determination of the latter power not to yield up her Lombardo-Venetian territories so long as she can possibly retain them. Will she now consent to yield up her authority over them at the suggestion even of Prussia and England combined? We think not. Her obstinacy is proverbial, and she knows that her advantages of position will increase as she slowly retreats to the mountains, while the disadvantages of the allies will be correspondingly increased.

NEW FRENCH SWORD BAYONET.

The London Times publishes the following communication regarding this instrument.

An eye-witness has assured me that one of the causes which demoralized the Austrian soldier is the new weapon—the sword bayonet—with which he is attacked by the French soldier, and against which neither his own old bayonet nor his superior physical strength are of any avail.

Not only can the sword bayonet give thrust for thrust with the older weapon, but while it thrusts, or withdraws after delivering it, it severs the tendons of the arm or leg of the opponent, thus completely disabling him prior to the last death blow. Moreover, the French soldier is taught to wield his weapon by poising it like a quarter staff horizontally as high as the head of his adversary, and by a slight movement in the segment of a circle the sharp blade is swept across the neck, chest, or face of three men opposed to him in line.

This novel mode of attack cannot be met by the old musket and bayonet; hence the Austrian soldier has in despair resorted to the butt of his musket in endeavoring to crush his enemy, who, agile, skilful of fence, and rendered confident by the superiority of his new arm, can deliver three wounds with his sword bayonet while his antagonist is swinging his club.

If we do not look to the new modes of attack develop ing by the French, the opener line borrowed from our own Highlanders, and the sword musket, we shall be as much and as shamefully surprised by the French as we were by the Americans.

A CHANGE OF RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

It is understood that Rev. J. P. Tustin, late a Baptist clergyman, but now traveling in Europe, has applied to Right Rev. Bishop Clark, of this diocese, for orders in the Episcopal Church.—Providence (R. I.) Press.

It is even so. We write it in sadness, shame, and indignation. It was bad enough for Mr. Tustin to allow himself to be worried out of the Baptist ranks by one who has been expelled from them; it is bad enough that he should have gone over to Episcopacy under circumstances that shatter the confidence of his old friends, and will render him an object of suspicion to his new; it is bad enough that he should have deserted sacred principles, which he has defended and preached through so many years, from other than conscientious convictions; but, if possible, it is worst of all that he should have wronged his personal friends, who have suffered and sacrificed in sustaining him, by not breathing to them an intimation of his purpose.—Southern Baptist.

REMARKS ON THE ABOVE.

Dr. Tustin is a very able man, and has stood high among his brethren. Until recently, he was the Corresponding Secretary of the Southern Baptist Board of Publication, Charleston, S. C. But he has lately seen Baptist Church government tested. He has seen that it gives the true man against the false, the man in the right against the man in the wrong, only such advantage as may be got in a general scramble. Is this the beginning of an Exodus?

THE CHURCH IN CALIFORNIA.

We clip the following items from the Pacific Methodist.

Bishop Pierce.—The ministrations of Bishop Pierce in this city last Sabbath, 19th ult., says the Pacific Methodist were attended by crowded audiences. Many went away unable to obtain seats at the morning service, and in the evening Dr. Scott's spacious Church was filled to its utmost capacity. The sermons were of a character to do good; while characterized by the felicity of diction and logical strength for which the Bishop is so well known, they were eminently practical and pointed. The expectation of the Church that his visit to California will result in great good to the cause of Christianity, will not be disappointed. He will visit as many points as possible. The Church will be notified of his movements through the Methodist.

The Bishop's engagements will continue him to the city for two or three weeks, after which he expects to visit all the principal points of the State, and as many of the minor ones as possible.

The Church in Earnest.—Wanted immediately—Fifty class-leaders to assist in training the Church for the conquest of California. To persons properly qualified, immediate and regular employment will be given, and the best wages paid. None but steady and reliable men need apply. For further particulars, inquire within.

Dedication.—The new Methodist Church, South, in Sacramento, will be dedicated by Bishop Pierce on Sunday, 10th of July. Services to commence at 10½ o'clock.

POPULATION OF SAN FRANCISCO.

We mentioned a day or two ago that the population of San Francisco, by a census just taken, was 78,082. This is a city which eleven years ago was a little Spanish settlement, no larger than it had been a century or more before. The United States Government obtained possession of California in 1847; the gold mines were discovered in 1848; American emigration began then, and now there is a handsome city, with many elegant buildings, and a population of nearly eighty thousand. The history of the world scarcely affords a parallel to this rapid growth, and it is the more remarkable from the fact that the city is at a distance of many thousand miles from the centres of American and European population, and for a long time was only approachable by a long and tedious voyage around Cape Horn. Of the whole population 73,328 are whites, 3,150 are Chinese, and 1,600 are colored. There are only about twent-five thousand females in the city, so that the males are to the females in the proportion of two to one.

STATISTICS OF M. E. CHURCHES.

Total members, traveling and local preachers in the M. E. Church, (North.)	979,891
Total do. M. E. Church, South	660,166
	1,640,057

The Advocate and Journal in giving the statistics of the Wesleyan family throughout the world says: "The existence and vigorous growth of the different branches of the Methodist family afford ample material for reflection and speculation. According to the foregoing table there are in the European bodies an aggregate of membership, including the ministry, of not less than 740,266; and in the bodies that belong to this country, including the M. E. Church in Canada, 1,831,705. Uniting the two, and we have the round number of 2,581,961. This is a result of momentous significance; and shows what may be done by the simple enforcement of the truth upon the heart and life, marked features in the general history of Methodism, as a religious agency."

A DANGEROUS USE OF PHOTOGRAPH.

A curious circumstance has just happened to M. Aguado, whose talent in Photography has given him a European celebrity. He laid a wager that he would exactly imitate a French bank note that the difference should not be perceptible. By the time appointed the note was ready, and laid side by side with the original upon his desk. Judge, jury, all were there ready to seize the smallest indication which should lead them into a right guess. The gentleman who laid the wager took both the notes in his hands to examine them in the strong light from the window. By some accident he changed or shuffled them from one hand to the other; and when he returned to the desk neither Mr. Aguado himself nor any one of the company could tell which was the false note and which was the true! There they lie still—two thousand frank notes—and all connoisseurs are invited to give an opinion. Needless to say that the Banque de France has sent its most expert judges, but without effect.—European Times.

ANOTHER NEW STYLE OF VESSEL.—THE VELOCINAVE.

An English paper says that M. J. Brunet has invented a new kind of vessel which he calls the "Velocinave," and which he asserts will travel through the water at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five miles an hour, which is more than is performed in the same time by the fastest boats now known, such as the paddle steamers of the English companies, the sailing clippers of the Americans, the our canoes of the Muiays, and the last of the screw-steamers of France. The invention is based upon the principle that the ship ought to proceed through the water cleaving the liquid mass by means of turning points, thus transforming the friction of gliding into the friction of rolling. It works, in short; like a cooper's hoop in the water. M. Brunet gives to his vessel the form of a circular cylinder, terminated by two cones revolving on the same axis. These cones form the prow and the poop of the ship. The Velocinave can, it is said, be worked with safety under water, in which case it is furnished with a deck-funnel for ventilation and light. M. Brunet declares that the essential principle of his invention can be applied to any existing vessel without interfering with its build.

MACAULEY'S HISTORY.

Blackwood, for June, says: "Macaulay, in his department, we still regard as unrivalled. He is beyond comparison the greatest master of brilliant and seductive fiction that ever adorned the language or disgraced the literature of England. It is impossible for an Englishman—it is impossible for any honest man, to rise from a perusal of this attack upon Marlborough, and an examination of the evidence on which it rests, without feelings of the deepest indignation."

WEST TROY FOUNDERY.

It is gratifying to know that notwithstanding the general dullness of the times, Church building is still going on extensively throughout the country; at least we infer this from the business aspect at the Bell Foundry in this place. From morning until night the bells are "lifting their voices," and filling our ears with every variety of tone, from majestic bass to soaring treble. Orders for no less than forty bells—most of them for Church bells—were received at this establishment during the past year. Upon application to A. Meneely's Sons, West Troy, N. Y., their descriptive circulars are sent gratis.

Schamyl, the famous Caucassian Chief, has ordered the decapitation of his own son; who, it will be remembered, after a detention of several years in Russia, where he became an officer in the army, was not long since sent back to his father. His offence, suspected complicity with the Russians.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE DEPOSITORY.—Our old friend, Rev. John F. Early, son of the venerable Bishop, has been appointed Agent of this Depository, and has re-cently taken charge. He is well qualified for the business having been connected with the Publishing House for some years. He is also a pleasant gentleman in all respects. See his advertisement under the head of special notices. We visited the Depository on our way to Georgia recently, and found their book-store one of the pleasantest and best arranged we had seen.

COL. T. W. TRACY of Grenada, Mississippi, appends his name to the advertisement of a lady, whose acquirements should challenge immediate attention. See advertisement.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

HILLSBOROUGH.—REV. J. GREEN writes: "Perhaps it would not be amiss for me, as a laborer in the vineyard, to communicate to the many friends of the Bible cause in the district assigned me, viz: the counties of Leake, Neshoba, Kemper, Lauderdale, Newton, Scott, Smith, Jasper, Clark and Wayne—what I have been doing in my labors. That the friends of the Bible cause literally may be encouraged in the cause, permit me to speak to them through your paper.

"When I received the appointment to this district, I was told by friends in the western part of the State, where I came, that the Board had given me a missionary work, and that it would not support itself, but would be an expense to the parent society. I did not, however, think so; and assured them that we would succeed in the work; and, that the Lord being our support, we would go. In every family within the ten counties ere the setting in of cold weather supplied with the Holy word of God. They bid me sincerely God speed; and I went to Leake county, where, immediately on my arrival, I found willing hearts ready to go into the work and do their might.

"This county, it was thought by the Board could be canvassed by volunteers; and, at their suggestion, I went through the greater part of it, and saw the committee appointed, and solicited their voluntary labors in canvassing their own neighborhoods. Those whom I saw, readily consented to do this work, provided we would wait until their crops were safely in. We have since had a meeting of the friends of the cause, and it was unanimously agreed to do the work by volunteers, and carry it on from year to year. It is not yet begun; it will, about the third Monday in this month be entered upon by all hands, and completed in a few days; saving the expense of a hired agent. Too much cannot be said in praise of our friends in Leake county. Pray that they may succeed.

"In Neshoba we have ordered books and employed an agent to canvass the county. Indomitable spirits have the management of affairs in this county. I passed through the western part of the county, soliciting donations to the Society, and every where met with a hearty response. I will narrate a school-room adventure. Passing by Mr. Adams', in company with Mr. Russell, I asked him to introduce me to the teacher. Here marked that he so do, that I need not calculate to make any thing there. I told him that I was an old school-teacher; and I would like to prove to him what I could do with children. We found several young men there. After a short conversation with Mr. Adams, he gave me one dollar, and the liberty to address the school. I availed myself of this permission: their little hearts seemed to burn with Christian philanthropy; and they responded—the larger ones giving fifty cents each, while the smaller ones gave a dime. I took great pleasure in talking with these children on the privileges they enjoyed; and it could be seen upon their countenances what were the inmost workings of their souls. Such are the hopes of our country and our religion. May the Lord bless them, and continue the same spirit within them through life.

"Kemper has been for some time doing well. Their agent, Bro. Bartlett, is succeeding in supplying the destitute. During the first three weeks of his labor, did not solicit any donations; but is now doing the whole work as he goes. There are persons about De Kalb, who have not set their hearts on things of this world, but look for the salvation of their fellow-men. The Lord will bless them.

"This far, the prospect seems to be good. I anticipate a hearty reception throughout, and would be glad, if counties, yet to be visited, would consider on the volunteer plan—and act upon it. The destitution is very great, and it must be supplied. It is our duty to do it, or we are not clear in the great commission—'Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature.'

MIDDLETON CIRCUIT.—REV. W. P. DICKINSON writes: "We have just closed a meeting at Salem, which resulted in twenty-three conversions and thirty-two accessions. To God be all the praise."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

MACON MISSION.—REV. T. A. HOPKINS writes: "A portion of our work is to preach the gospel to the benighted round our own firesides. May God carry on the good work until the offer of salvation shall be made to every member of every household—until every slave within our geographical limits, as a Church, shall have heard the gospel preached to them.

"God has prospered our work. We have received upwards of two hundred into the Church; most of who have been converted. We preach to several hundred slaves at plantations; but are now agitating the chapel system. We have been convinced all the year that it is the only system whereby the growing wants of our negro missions can be supplied. Our large cotton farmers are alive to the subject.

"The fruits have been good. There is a practical demonstration of the negro capacity to become religious in our midst; or rather, that God is able and willing to change the Ethiopian as well as the white man, and make him a new being in Christ Jesus. They are God's poor, and we are sent in Christ's stead to preach to them. I want to see the chapel system adopted all over this country; making the cost nominal; systematizing the work so that it would be accomplished with the least labor and greatest success. It is the most frugal plan for master and ministry. It will take away less of our ministerial talent, and less money out of the people's pocket. Besides it gives the small farmer an equal chance with the larger—three, four or half a dozen, may unite. In a word, it is the only plan that takes in every household and places, the gospel in reach of every negro in our beloved South."

WEST WOOD STATION.—REV. J. W. WILLIAMS writes: "It may do the friends of Zion good to know that the Lord has visited West Wood Methodist Episcopal Church, with a refreshing shower. At our second Quarterly Conference, the brethren resolved to unite their efforts to build up the Sabbath-school which had dwindled to a very few—and but little interest manifested by parents or children; they went to work in good earnest; their labors were abundantly blessed, and now I do not know that I ever saw greater interest manifested by teachers, parents and children. You would be pleased to see the sparkling eyes and happy faces of the children on Sunday morning at the Sabbath-school.

"On the night of the 19th inst., the Lord was present with us, and several came to the altar for prayers; we continued the meeting every night during the week, with increased interest; and last Sunday night the Holy Spirit came down in great power. Sinners were converted and the Church revived. There has been seven conversions, and ten united with us on probation.

"The working is still going on. We expect to follow the intimations of God, yet longer. Pray for us, that we may be made abundantly blessed. The most important feature of this revival is that most of the converts are Sabbath-school scholars.

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

FRANKFORT, July 4.—At an extraordinary sitting of the Diet to-day, Prussia presented new and further proposals respecting the command in chief of the corps of observation on the Rhine, immediately after the sitting, M. de Usedon left for Berlin.

Two corps will be stationed on the Silesian frontier, to guard against Russia on the lower and middle Vistula. One hundred and forty thousand Prussians will be thus stationed, and when all her preparations are completed, Prussia will probably make her proposals to France.

Suspension of hostilities—Armistice until 15th August—Strong Hopes of Peace—Excitement on the Paris Bourse—Loss of the Ship Sarah Minot—The Armistice—Navigation of the Adriatic—King Oscar of Sweden Dead—Russia Preparing for War—General Intelligence.

NEW YORK, July 21.—The British and North American royal mail steamer Africa, Capt. Shannon, has arrived at this port, bringing dates of the 9th instant from Liverpool, consequently two days later than the intelligence brought by the City of Washington.

Political and General Intelligence.

LONDON, July 9.—Intelligence has reached here to the effect that a suspension of hostilities between the contending powers has been agreed upon until the 15th of August.

In consequence of the armistice, strong hopes are entertained of peace.

LONDON, June 9.—A despatch from Paris states that there was great excitement on the Paris Bourse, the effect of the late news.

LIVERPOOL, July 9.—The ship Sarah Minot, from New Orleans to this port, has been destroyed by fire at sea.

The officers and crew were all saved and have arrived at this port. [The Sarah Minot was an American ship of 1095 tons, cleared by Messrs. Creevy & Furwell, from this port on the 23d of May last for Liverpool, loaded with 3124 bales of cotton and 4800 staves. Rep. Associated Press.]

LONDON, July 9.—The armistice which was signed on the 7th, at Villa Franee, by Generals Hesse and Vallant; stipulates that all commercial vessels shall navigate the Adriatic unmolested.

The Austrian Federal Diet has proposed to mobilize the whole of the Federal Contingent, and have requested the Prince Regent of Prussia to take command.

VIENNA, July 8.—The French Frigate Imperense bombarded Sara yesterday, but upon the fire being returned the frigate withdrew, and appeared to have suffered considerable injury.

A large French fleet was seen near Venice, and another fleet of ten sail was seen from Trieste, bearing towards that place.

LONDON, July 6.—Letters from Persia state that she is making great preparations, in anticipation of a war with Turkey.

LONDON, July 9.—Letters from Rome and Florence state that the excitement in the Papal states still continues, in consequence of the massacres at Perugio, Ancona, and other cities. Investigations have been ordered as to the origin of the popular movements. It appears that terrible cruelties are inflicted upon the Mazzinians in the revolted districts, under prefext of an order from His Holiness, Pius IX.

VIENNA, July 8.—The official reports from the headquarters of the army in Italy, give the following account of the loss at the battle of Solferino. The number of killed is put down at 2500; wounded and missing, 8621.

The French and Sardinian loss in killed and wounded is set down at 15,250.

LONDON, July 9.—The admiralty has issued orders for the raising of 10,000 additional seamen for the British navy, at a liberal bounty.

Intelligence from Stockholm confirms the death of King Oscar at that place.

Arrival of the North Briton.—Dates to the 13th inst.

LONDON, July 13th.—The following is a copy of the peace dispatch sent by Napoleon to Eugenia, dated Villegio, July 11th,

A treaty of peace has been signed between the Emperor of Austria and myself, on the following basis: The Italian Confederacy to be under the honorary Presidency of the Pope. The Emperor of Austria concedes his rights in Lombardy to the Emperor of the French, who transfers them to the King of Sardinia.

The Emperor of Austria preserves Venice, but she will form an integral part of the Italian confederacy.

(Signed) NAPOLEON.

The Paris Monitear says that the great neutral Powers exchanged communications with the belligerants, offering mediation, but were unsuccessful until the French fleet were about commencing operations against Venice and a conflict before Verona was imminent, when Napoleon, finding the Emperor of Austria willing, concluded the armistice.

The Emperors had an interview at Villafranca on the 11th inst.

A dispatch from Turin says, that Napoleon issued a bulletin from Valleggio, announcing the armistice, congratulating the troops upon their exploits, and announcing his immediate departure for Paris, leaving the provisional command of the army in the hands of Marshal Valliant.

The Austrian Account.

LONDON, July 13.—A dispatch from Verona says that the Armistice was concluded, only after repeated requests from the French, and after Austria had obtained all she asked.

Kossauth and Hungary.

LONDON, July 13.—It is reported that Kossuth would propose for a Maunrchial Government for Hungary.

Opinions of the English Press.

LONDON, July 13.—The London News says that the hopes and expectations of Italy have been deceived, and that history will call Napoleon to account, for making a war upon false pretences, and then signing a mock and selfish peace, that leaves Austria impregnably fortified in the ports of Northern Italy, and commits Central Italy to the patronage of the Pope.

The London Post contends that the Pope is deprived of substance, but keeps the shadow of supremacy.

The London Times says that France has spent fifty million pounds and lost 50,000 men only to give Milan a Piedmontese master, and establish the Pope in temporary dignity even beyond his imagination.

PARIS, June 13.—Napoleon's peace dispatch caused an immediate rise in the funds of 2½ per cent.

LONDON, July 13.—The news of the peace transpired after the closing hours of Consols, which afterwards sold at 90¾—all other securities buoyant.

The News of Peace in Parliament.

LONDON, June 13.—The news of Peace was received with prolonged cheers in the House of Lords and Commons.

DOMESTIC.

War Vessels for the Gulf—The Brazil Squadron—Suspected Slaver.

WASHINGTON, July 22.—I. A. Cushman, of Mississippi, has been appointed Minister to the Argentine Confederation, vice Yancy, resigned.

The President has tendered the Central American mission to D. M. Barringer, of North Carolina, but it is thought that he will decline.

An important despatch from Minister McLane, has caused the Government to order the sloop-of-war Savannah again to the Gulf of Mexico.

Our war vessels on the Brazil station have been ordered to the river La Plata, to remain there during the unsettled condition of affairs.

NEW BEDFORD, July 20.—The ship Atlantic, which cleared from this port for the Indian Ocean, has been seized on suspicion of being a slaver.

ST. LOUIS, July 22.—Intelligence has been received here to the effect that the Indians along the Santa Fe route have disappeared, and their present locality unknown.

WASHINGTON, July 22.—The dispatches received here from our Minister, Mr. McLane, show that there has yet been no treaty made with Mexico.

Senor Mata, the Mexican Minister, goes to-morrow to New York to meet Senor Lordo de Pejado.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, July 25, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 23d instant: The past week has been a period of very little animation in the market generally, and with low stocks of our leading products, and most of the usual operators absent on their summer tours, we must look for an interval of great dullness, until the fair opening of a new business season.

On Saturday, Sunday and Monday, European advices were received by the Weser, the Borussia and the Indian, the last with Liverpool dates to the 6th inst., being four days later than those previously at hand by the Canada. They report the Liverpool Cotton market dull, though unchanged in prices, with sales for the three days of 19,000 bales. On Tuesday advices still one day later were received, by the steamer City of Washington at New York, reporting an improved demand for Cotton at Liverpool, the sales for one day (Wednesday the 6th) being 15,000 bales, with slightly improved prices.

P. S.—Last evening we understood that dispatches had been received announcing the arrival of the Africa at New York, with favorable advices for Cotton, the week's sales being stated at 70,000 bales and the advance in prices at ⅛ to ¼ per pound.

The weather throughout the past week has been generally clear and very warm, with a prevalence of good health.

The river has fallen 2 feet 10 inches within the week, and is now 8 feet below high-water mark.

COTTON.—A very quiet week has passed in the Cotton market, and we shall have little of interest to notice in this important staple until our stock is replenished with supplies of the new crop. At present the inquiry is only limited, but the stock is not of the extent and character adapted even to the limited demand which prevails, as it consists mostly of low-running mixed lists, while nearly all the orders in hand call for qualities ranging from Low Middling to Good Middling. The sales of the week amount to about 5100 bales—viz: 1200 on Saturday, 1000 on Monday, 900 on Tuesday, 900 on Wednesday, 1000 on Thursday, and 200 on Friday. Total receipts of the week 12566, and since the 1st September (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,653,523 bales against 1,554,538, bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 6275 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 22d inst., 28,716 bales. Although prices have shown considerable irregularity, yet the transaction in general have been at rates within the range of previous quotations, which are continued.

In the early part of the week European advices to the 7th inst. were received, which were rather favorable respecting the markets abroad, but they exercised little or no influence here.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

OUR OWN NOTICES.

Pay Postage.—Persons writing on their own business, and requiring answers, will enclose in postage stamps; otherwise, they will receive no attention. This does not apply to our Agents.

What Name I—Contributions and Correspondence of whatever character, must be accompanied by the real name of the writer. Writers may publish over real or assumed names, as they choose; but, if the editor has not in his possession the real name of the writer, no communication will be published.

Free Papers.—All the Itinerant Ministers and Preachers of the patronizing Conferences are expected to act as our Agents, and will receive the paper gratis. Those of other Conferences will receive it gratis upon their proposal to act as our Agents.

Be Merciful to the Editor.—We receive, from all parts of the country, all sorts of requests and commissions, requiring attention to almost every kind of business. We have heretofore been compelled to give most of these things the cold shoulder. Hereafter, however, we are determined to have all these requests, if possible, attended to. Our clerk, Mr. R. Oliver, an excellent business man, will take them in hand, and be responsible.

Job-Work, of the finest kind, and of every variety, and in the promptest manner, will be done, if sent to the Advocate Office. Terms cash on delivery.

REV. KEENER: Please to have the above inserted in the N. O. Advocate as long as you may judge proper.

Say to Bro. Parker that I desire him to act as Joint Agent with you, in place of Dr. McTyeire, resigned.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

To all Dealers with Southern Methodist Publishing-house.

To carry out fully the spirit and law of the last General Conference in reference to the sale and circulation of Books, and to accommodate as far as possible all our customers, we have carefully revised our Catalogue, and modified the prices of our publications. Our new Catalogue will be issued at no distant day. In the meantime, we notify all concerned that hereafter we shall sell to wholesale dealers Books embraced in our GENERAL CATALOGUE at 25 per cent. discount on six months' time, a deduction for cash of 10 per cent. of the net amount of the bill.

On Books not of our own publication, we will allow 20 per cent. discount on six months' time, with a deduction of 10 per cent. on the net bills for cash.

This, however, does not include Sunday-school and Tract Books, nor those embraced in Part III. of our present Catalogue.

J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

P. S.—Those books which we publish for the authors will be placed in the second class of discounts, as above indicated.

TO PRESIDING ELDERS OF ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Permit me to call the attention of the Presiding Elders of the Alabama Conference, to the Resolution adopted by that body, requiring them to furnish the Secretary of the Board of Finance with a report of their assessment of the Conference Collection among the Circuits and Stations in their respective Districts, for record by him.

Let me make another request of the brethren. That they furnish me reliable information of all the Claimants on the Conference Fund residing in their Districts; the Superannuated, the Widows; the number of children, and their ages.

Nothing but my inability to procure this necessary information otherwise, leads me to make this request.

Any Preacher of the Alabama Conference, whose eye is caught by this notice, will confer a favor if he will furnish me this intelligence. W. E. M. LINFIELD, Sec. B. F.

Distressing Scene in a Log Cabin.

In one of the Southern counties of a Southwestern State, there was a little log-cabin, twelve by fourteen feet, with a door-way cut in the logs, to which a board door was hung upon squeaking wooden hinges; a dirt and stick chimney was at one end, at the other stood a large oak which in the summer time shaded the entire roof, and in the fall rattled down bushels of acorns. The partially closed cracks between the logs served for windows. Within, on the puncheon floor, was a rude bedstead, but neatly furnished; a few board shelves served as cupboard and dairy, under which were neatly arranged a few cooking utensils. Three or four chairs and stools completed the furniture of the room. A woman—near thirty years of age, and three children, the eldest six years old, called the cabin—home.

The husband and father had been absent, as a day laborer, for a week. The poor woman looked languid and sick as she busied herself preparing the homely meal for her little ones. "Oh!" she mutters, "why don't John come home? I am so sick, so lonely. What will become of my four children, when I am dead? I feel that I have not long to live; the Spirit whispers, 'Come home: in thy father's house are many mansions.' And, O, how I long to go and be at rest. But my dear babes, how can I leave you in this cold, weary world?"

The afflicted mother looked above, and a ray of Divine comfort was shed over her heart; and she was enabled to cast her care on Jesus. After a vain struggle to perform her household duties, the sick woman laid down on a miserable pallet, hugging closely to her bosom her infant of six months.

Little Jerry and Emma were quietly playing in the warm sunshine at the door; with a speechless look of love towards them, and a firmer clasp around her babe, the life-weary mother fell asleep in Jesus.

"Mamma, dear mamma," said little Jerry, pulling at his mother's hand. "Wake up, it is getting dark; and Sissy is hungry and crying."

Alas, alas, poor Jerry! never more shall that good mother attend to your pleading cries!

As the night grew darker, the motherless ones crept under the cover near their dead parent, and wept themselves to sleep.

The bright sunbeams, shining through the crevices between the logs, awoke the hungry children.

With piteous cries they again tried to awake their mother, but finding that she still lay cold and motionless, a great fear, that calmed their childish grief, came over their young spirits; and Jerry, taking his baby sister in his arms, with little Emma clinging to him, crept away in the warm light, out of doors.

In a short time poor little Emma and the baby cried incessantly for food. Jerry too was very hungry, but he did not say so; his manly little heart felt the responsibility resting on him; and after vain attempts to pacify his sisters, he left them in the shade of the oak, and went into the house to look for something to eat. He found some bread and a few small scraps of meat on the shelves, these he carried out and divided with his sisters.

As the day advanced the children were cheered by seeing a man on horseback riding along the unfrequented path, not far distant from the house. They ran to the fence and called to him, "Please stop sir! please stop and see poor mamma."

The cries of the forlorn little ones did not reach the traveler; so he rode on, leaving them still more lonely and afraid. The warm June day passed slowly away, and Jerry and the little girls went into the house and lying down on a quilt, again wept themselves to sleep.

Ah! it is a sight to melt a miscreant's heart. Husband and father, where are you that you tarry so long from those you have sworn to nourish and protect? Alas, he cares not for the faded woman now lying in her last, cold sleep! or, surely he would leave his place of labor a few miles distant, at least once during the week, to look after the sick wife he had left in the deep, dark swamp. But we will judge the husband charitably; for if his was intentional neglect, he carries ever with him an accuser that will never let him rest, unless he comes with deep penitence and many tears to Him, who is ever ready to receive the weary and heavy laden.

But to return to the log-cabin and its desolate inmates. The morning was dark and gloomy, and gusts of wind ever and anon swept hurriedly over and through the leafy forest. A deep sleep had hushed the moans of the babe, Jerry and Emma sat close to each other on the door-sill; their tear-stained faces looking so sadly resigned, that one would think they had grown old in misery. The cloudy, misty morning, the quietude of the place, the unconscious mother so cold and stiff on her pallet of moss, caused Jerry and Emma to look fearfully around; and they started, their hands closely clasped, as they heard a limb crash to the ground, and scrambling over the fence that inclosed the yard, they hastened along the path the traveler went.

"O Buddy I'm so hungry and tired, let's stop here; O Mamma, mamma!" and poor little Emma cried very bitterly as she sat by the road-side.

Jerry sat down beside her, and putting his arm around her neck he said, "don't cry Sissy; let's ask God to take care of us and give us something to eat. You know, dear mamma said, He would do it if we asked Him." And the two little ones knelt down on the green grass, and the prayer was heard by Him, who said, "Unless ye become like one of these little one's, ye cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. They were not forgotten, their heavenly Father was leading them in a way they knew not.

Blessed sleep soon closed their eyes, and they slept on till the sun rose high; and, as the clouds parted, cast his warm beams in the children's faces. Jerry suddenly awoke, and calling his sister they got up and ran along the road.

"There are some blackberries," exclaimed Jerry, "we will get some."

They set eagerly to gathering the berries, and after satisfying their hunger waited hastily along. In a half hour they came to a rail-fence that enclosed a pretty yard, around a double log-house. Peering timidly through the fence, they moved silently on.

A dark-haired, pleasant looking woman, with mild, dark blue eyes, was seated with her sewing, in the shade, in front of her house; casually raising her eyes from her work she saw the children beyond the fence, and told them to come in.

Opening the gate, they came gently along until they stood before the lady. With a quick glance at the lady's face they saw she would sympathize with them; and bursting into tears, Jerry told his tale of sorrow. The lady listened with tearful eyes; then calling them kindly to her, she washed them; and soon they were eating with a relish, the nice food she placed before them. "Ah! when have we here, wife?" said a find athletic noble looking farmer, as he came in from the field.

The lady repeated what she had just heard, exclaiming, "This will never do; we must see to the poor woman." The farmer blew his horn for his "hands" to come in.

After dispatching a man for the father of the children, and to notify the neighbors; he, accompanid by a servant, proceeded to the cabin in the wilderness. In a few hours, the neighbors had collected; wonder was strongly marked on their sun-browned faces. It was a sad sight indeed that met those pioneer men and women, for some had brought their wives behind them to give necessary attention to the poor orphans and her helpless babe.

The infant was lying on the floor, with its face skinned in several places from contact with the rough puncheons—inconsolable—starving to death!

One of the kind-hearted comers took the baby in her arms, and hastening out of the door, she procured water and tenderly washed its face and hands; then sitting down at the root of the oak, she carefully milked into the mouth of the little sufferer some of her own darling's nourishment. The babe with difficulty swallowed a few mouthfuls; it began to revive, and, ere the close of half an hour opened its eyes, and drew falntly the motherly breast offered it. From that hour the motherless one has found a home on that kindly bosom. God bless that mother, may she live long to be nursed in her old age, by her loving children!

The bereaved man was late getting to his desolate home, and with lond grief he bemoaned his sad fate. The next morning, as the sun arose, the corpse was decently interred in a neighboring graveyard; the pitying neighbors returned to their respective homes.

The children were cared for, and their father locked his now deserted home, and went back to his labor, a sadder, and we hope a better man. M. A. C.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

"THE PANTRY."

The following is taken from the North Carolina Christian Advocate.

Who has not pleasant recollections connected with this word? In childhood, it was the wonderful cave," where were concealed untold treasures of sugar and preserves, sweet spices, and forbidden fruits. In girlhood, what rare times we have had in the pantry with some very confidential friend, munching pickies, dipping into the meat-pie, and cackling with mirth. And in later days, when planning and executing, what surprises and disappointments, triumphs and failures, have been witnessed there.

It was a proud, and exciting day, when for the first time the writer had a pantry of her own to arrange, and the new outfit of dishes and pans, pots and kettles, knives and forks, and all the etceteras—never forgetting those precious jars and cans that mother had sent—were to be duly arranged. At home the preserves were always kept on the topmost shelf—why, we perhaps can not tell—so they must go there now, though we had to climb upon a chair, and lift until our arms ached to get them up. The glass-ware and china, for extra occasions, occupy the next highest place, followed by the common dishes, and so on, down to the kettle in the corner, and the coffee-mill behind the door. It took a world of contriving and arranging before the final approving look was given, and then with an importance that none but a young house-keeper can know, the door was locked, and the key safely put, we thought—we were sure—in our pocket; but alas! it never was found again, and that was the first, but not the last vexation over the pantry. It were useless to speak of the lutrusive ants that came in, no one knows how, to pepper the cake and spice the sugar; of the roaches that shot like little imps over the shelves and into their hiding places; and the pruvoking mice that played such tricks with our pastry, and with our nerves—these, alas! have not all passed away.

I have learned one or two things in pantry experience valuable to me, perhaps to others. It should be large and airy. Time enough is wasted and dishes enough broken in a "cluttered" up little closet, to pay for the room needed, even if comfort and good temper are not counted. Anybody's nasal organs, if at all sharp, will prove the necessity of free ventilation. The shelves should be movable, so that they may be taken down and scrubbed, and the wall behind them properly whitewashed. It is well to have them numbered by notches or otherwise, so that they can be readily replaced. Ants may be kept out by making the shelves of black walnut. For mice we have found nothing equal to toasted cheese. They are very fond of it. The proper way to give it is in a small wire trap. A few doses, occasionally, will suffice. The roaches dislike hot water exceedingly, and it is said that elderberry bark, powdered finely and distributed about their haunts, will drive them away; I have not tried it. Cleanliness is a good preventive. Instead of placing the preserves on the top shelf, and risking broken limbs and jars whenever they were wanted, I have found it better to have a locker or tight box made in one corner of the pantry, which can be scarcely closed. A few drawers, in which knives and forks, spoons, spices, etc., can be kept safely, are convenient. But more hereafter. BETSY.

PLANTS IN ROOMS.

In the crowded city, amid its dusts, smoke, turmoil, and troubles, it is pleasant to find a memento of the country in the opening rose and the modest daisy. When we see a pot of flowers adorning the window of a room, however humble in appearance the domicile may be, the feeling arises spontaneously in the mind that they are fostered by the gentle hand of some one whose tastes are true and tender. A few words on the culture of plants in rooms may be beneficial to many persons at this particular season of the year. They should be placed in a situation where they can receive an abundance of light and air; otherwise they will become sickly. Exposure to the dews (where this can be safely done in cities), then taking them in next morning, greatly promotes their health.

Plants are frequently injured by injudicious watering. Some persons seem to suppose that deluges of water afford a sure remedy for all the evils to which plants are subject. This is a mistake. True, they required considerable amount of moisture, but not one half the quantity which is oftentimes applied. Evening is the best time to water them, and in every case cold water from a cistern or a pump should be avoided. The water should be warmed by exposure to the sun, or in some other manner, up to the temperature of the atmosphere before it is used. Many plants are greatly retarded in their growth by cold water being poured upon them. The quantity to be applied varies with the size and nature of the flower; the ground should be thoroughly moistened, but not soaked. If the leaves should be infested with insects, some tobacco juice, mixed with water and sprinkled over them, will soon destroy these. The great feature in cultivating plants, to promote their health, is that which is equally efficacious with human beings—cleanliness.

PROPORTION OF CLERGYMEN TO POPULATION.

According to the census of 1850, there were in the United States 23,190,876 people. At the same time there were 26,842 clergymen, or one clergyman to 863 persons. But New Hampshire takes the lead in supporting clergymes, as she has one clergyman to every 490 persons. Connecticut stands next, with one clergyman to every 526 persons. All the New England States support one clergyman to less than 600 persons. New York has one clergyman to every 722 persons. Virgiaia one to 1,317; South Carolina one to 1,410; Louisiana one to 3,000.

ITALY'S GLORIES.

The first modern epic poet, says a French writer, is an Italian, Daute; the first lyric poet, Petarch; the first poet of chivalry, Tasso; the first romanticist poet, Ariosto; the first modern tale writer, Boccassio; the first sculptor, Michael Angelo; the first vigorous political writer, and the first historian of Modern Italy, Machiavelli; the first philosophical historian, Vico; the discoverer of the New World, Christopher Columbus; the first demonstrator of the laws of the celestial sphere, Galileo;—were all Italians.

SUBLIME.

From a Wisconsin paper we take the following, in which, after describing a farm which the advertiser wants to sell, he adds:

The surrounding country is the most beautiful the God of nature ever made. The scenery is celestial—divine; also two wagons to sell, and a yoke of steers.

PRAYER FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

In the Synagogues of the Israelites all through the United States, a Prayer is offered every Saturday, for the President and Vice-President of the United States, Governor and Legislature of the State, and local authorities. The Prayer for the city has been most beautifully written out in Hebrew and English, by Rev. Dr. I. Meyers, and both copies most neatly framed by Ginzier. It is a well written prayer, and is pronounced every Sabbath here in English. [Hartford Times.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. SARAH EVELINA BARNETT, wife of Nicholas D. Barnett, and daughter of George and Ann Powell, died near Mount Meigs, Alabama, June 13, 1859, in the 29th year of her age. In the death of this amiable and lovely Christian lady the Church has lost a valued member, society an ornament, and her husband and family a cherished friend, whose place will never be supplied. Sister Barnett was a subject of the extensive work of grace enjoyed by this community in the Summer and Autumn of 1845. Though but fifteen years of age, she sought and found the Saviour of sinners, and from that time on—amid all the temptations that beset the path of the young, and tend to draw them awey from their fidelity to Christ—she maintained her integrity; and so exemplified the attractive virtue of Christianity in her life and spirit, that those associated with her, though they had hitherto had but feeble faith in it, were constrained to admit its reality. Through her ngency, religion and the ministry found their way where hitherto they had been strangers. For her husband's spiritual welfare, she prayed fervently and labored earnestly; and we trust those prayers will yet be answered in his salvation; and though now separated, will be re-united in the world of joy. Enshrined in the heart of friendship and affection—surrounded by all the comforts of life, and having at her command all the sources of earthly enjoyment—it was hard to go down to the grave while yet in early womanly bloom. Her heart lingered a little with its cherished objects in life; but feeling that her Saviour called, she turned away from all to him, and was mercifully delivered from all anxiety, and wonderfully raised above all fear of death. A new and brighter light dawned upon her, and a new song of praise was given her. Frequently during the two or three days preceding her death, she gave utterence to her feelings of trust and confidence, and of resignation to the will of God. No word of murmuring was heard. Though most tenderly attached to her children, she was enabled calmly to commit them to the keeping of her Heavenly Father, and feel that they were safe. One by one—she then called her husband, father, mother, brother and sister—and gave them her dying charge: giving to some, words of admonition; to all, those of comfort. She requested them to be calm—to restrain their grief, that they might not disquiet her by their anguish, as she waded into the waters of death. It was a death-scene that honored religion, and magnified the grace of God; bringing to mind the triumphant saying of older years, "our people die well," "Let me die the death of the righteous, let our last end be like his."

June 25, 1859 J. HAMILTON,

MARY S. FOX, died of erysipelas, in Mooticello, Miss., on the 25th of June, 1859, in the sixty-third year of her age. Mrs. Fox was the daughter of Mary and John Thomas, of Franklin county, N. C., was married to Mr. Richard Fox, on the 12th of February, 1812. They settled and lived in Franklin until the spring of 1843, when they removed to the State of Mississippi, and settled on Pearl River, near Monticello. In the fall of 1853, Mr. Fox died, leaving her and nine children behind him. Mrs. Fox had experienced and passed through a considerable amount of the changes and vicissitudes of human life. She was born and reared to affluence; settled, to life, after her marriage, with highly flattering prospects. "But riches taketh to themselves wings and fly away;" so it was to her case. But under the influence of the faith of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, she had learned to be content in whatever condition the Providance of God placed her; always being cheerful and happy—neither elevated by prosperity nor depressed by adversity—and making all about her, partake of her spirit. Upwards of twenty years previous to her death, she was powerfully and happily converted to God; and, ever after, her delight was with the people of God. Though her afflictions were protracted and her sufferings very great, yet she bore them with Christian fortitude and resignation; and calm, with firm, steady, and unfaltering steps, down into the valley of the shadow of death—leaning upon the rod and staff of the Almighty, fearing no evil. In her death, her children have lost a Godly and pious mother; her relations and friends, one, whose ear was never deaf to the calls of want, of sickness, or distress; and the people of God, one, whose delight was to participate in the holy exercises of religion; but "she rests from her labours and her works do follow her." "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." J. W. WELLBORN.

MRS. RACHAEL COCKRON ELLIS, died at the residence of her son, Michael Ellis, Esq., near the town of Washington, on the 25th April, 1849. She was born in the State of Virginia, May 13th, 1770, consequently, at her death she lacked less than a month of accomplishing her eighty-ninth year. Her parents came to Mississippi, and settled near Washington in 1774; where she has resided ever since. She was the mother of a numerous family, and led an active life. In 1833, she connected herself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which she remained a worthy member till her demise. Her piety was unobtrusive and sincere. In her last, long and painful sickness she gave proofs of the sustaining and comfortiog influence of Divine grace. Her intellect was unimpaired to the last. Patiently did she wait for her change; long as the messenger delayed, he came suddenly and unexpectedly. On Saturday she ate at the table with her children; on Monday, she winged her flight to "fairer worlds on high." She was the youngest of three members of the little Church at Washington, who have died within the last four years. Mrs. Ford was ninety and Mrs. Connerly one hundred! They had resided near this place most of their lives. "So, sweet be thy rest till he bid thee arise."

R. M. DRAKE.

DR. ISAAC H. HILL, died of Consumption, in Louisiana, on Wednesday the 22nd June, 1859. The deceased was born in the State of Tennessee, August 10, 1829. Sometime in January, on his return home from Georgia, he was taken sick with what he supposed to be pneumonia. We saw that he was wasting away, and soon became convinced that his days were few. He started to his native State to recruit his health, but too late—he died on the way. Thus ended the days of an honest man. The Doctor was a kind affectionate husband, a doting father, a cheerful, sociable neighbor, and a skillful physician. He leaves a wife and two little children to mourn his death. In his death we have lost a faithful friend and kind relative, the community a useful man, the Methodist Church a long-tried and zealous member. He died as he had lived, a Christian. No fears of death—fully submissive to the will of God. He desired to live "a little longer with his wife and children," but knowing the will of his Maker, he resigned them to His care. Farewell dear friend, peace be to thy dust. A. C. HILL.

CARRIE BYRD, infant daughter of Dr. H. V. and Caroline E. Smith, aged 1 year, 5 months and 27 days, died at Lowndesboro, on 11th inst. at 12 o'clock, M. This deceased is a real heart-touching bereavement—a withering stroke of affliction. Let all Christian friends render a Christian sympathy to the relief of the bereaved. Another little cherub is added to the white-clothed throng. Let us rejoice then in the midst of our weeping. Let the stricken hearts of the bereaved, especially, take comfort, that Little Carrie Byrd, so lovely and endeared, is only beckoned away to the presence of Him, who said "Suffer little children to come unto me." "Amen: If God so will; I know that God is love!" "But love hath promised life, and therefore she shall live;" "So long as he is God, she shall be his creature!" T. M. L.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparille, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been above the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Chloris or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing,

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrutula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. she was cured of a deep seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatics of it was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Pana ea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no secret but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitance in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours, O. E. STAYTON.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from ... W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against the terrible scourge of children I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant, but by my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses or a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the eldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation. Helmbold's Extract of Buchu,

Read! Read! Read! "Ye afflicted read" the following Certificate of a cure of over 20 years' standing.

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians to no avail, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

And bright him all his cycle how to scan,
Not to a favored few she show'd the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
No! to all human kind command she gave,
"Employ your mind, and your sick bruiser save."
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and say other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would certainly have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of this kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.

The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain Calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred outweighs the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accompl

AGENCY OF THE EAST ALABAMA MALE COLLEGE AUBURN.

Mr. Editor: Please publish the following reflections and facts concerning the East Alabama Male College, at Auburn, just now on the eve of opening its halls for the reception of students. We commence by invoking prayer in its behalf. Prayer is all-important for the success of our Colleges. "Except the Lord buildeth the house, they labor in vain that build it." This fact, is equally true of East Alabama Male College and of every other enterprize. What then follows? plainly this; the friends of this Institution must invoke the Divine blessing upon it: otherwise, abounding liberality and the best laid plans of men will come to naught. Does the Church fully realize this necessity for the Divine blessing, in order to make our institutions of any account at all. If God refuse to bless them, we were better without them than with them.

We ask a contribution then, for our Colleges, from every one: from the poorest as well as the richest; it is the earnest, importunate, prevailing prayer of the child of God. Will you give it brethren—one and all? O, this would turn heaven's riches into our Endowment funds. If we are beside ourselves in this matter, it is unto the Lord.

Brethren, we speak the words of truth and soberness, when we say, "the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much." How much? Why everything! for it is written, "If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it." Prayer availed much in obtaining for Solomon "wisdom, as the sands of the sea-shore for multitude." It availed much in "enlarging the coasts of Jubez, and making him more honorable than all his brethren." It avails much in controlling the hearts of the mighty: for the king's heart is in the hands of the Lord, as rivers of water He turneth it whithersoever he wills:" and prayer digs the channel into which it turns those hearts.

Liberality of the Small and of the Great.

A touching incident of my College Agency occurred this year in Columbus, Mississippi. A widow, in extreme poverty, sent me by Bro. S—— one dime for the College; I took it, on condition he would engage that bro's earnest prayers in our behalf. The dime was accepted, and laid up in the treasury as a token for good for the prayers of faith follow it.

I enjoyed another pleasant incident in the same place. A lovely little girl, some three years old, asked "what does he want money for?" When I told her it was to build a College to raise up good men in, she said, "I will give you all my money; and, applying to her grandpapa, who was her banker, she gave me three dollars. Sweet little Willie Sykes! may God's blessing follow thee, and may the ways of pleasantness be thine.

These are blessed tokens for good, strengthening the hands of the Agent. Nor has God failed to touch the heart of the great in our behalf—great in the richest and best sense of the term—great in doing good.

There is our noble brother, Joel Hamilton, of Barbour county, who gave $12,500 in the name of his angel-daughter, Julia Ann.

And, more recently, Sister Eliza D. Battle of Mobile, has made her name a blessing upon earth, by the magnificent donation of $26,000 to the College.

A Bright Feature in our Methodism.

With such marked instances of a self-sacrificing liberality as the above, occurring frequently in our times, I am more hopeful of Methodism and of Christianity than ever before. I think we have fallen upon better times.

I honor the spirituality, the faith, the power of early methodism: I would have them perpetuated. But I do not admire the neglect to obey that positive command—"to honor the Lord with all thy substance;" which neglect, it seems to me, characterized to a great extent the early history of our Church. I believe, if we imitated them in this respect, grown as we now are to be a rich and a great people, we would soon be drowned in the love of the world, which is so fatal to the love of God. Remember, "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." I know of no possible way of overcoming the love of the world but by being "rich in good works"—ready to distribute, willing to communicate. My apology for the Methodism of the past is, in this respect, that the times of "this ignorance God winked at."

General Reflections on the Agency.

I have been, by order of the Alabama Conference, two and a-half years in the Agency. I entered the work reluctantly and tearfully, but with a deep sense of its importance and an earnest prayer to God to be with me. He has been with me, as I traveled from West Florida to East Mississippi—from the Gulf to the mountains. In all these bounds, wherever I have gone, I have seen beautiful instances of liberality—deeply affecting manifestations of a desire to glorify God with their substance. Such, and so many exhibitions to try to do good; and so many rich, spiritual seasons have I enjoyed with the brethren, that I must say with Balaam, "God is with him, and the shout of a King is among them. How goodly are thy tents, O, Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O, Israel."

It is true, I have found cases of a Demas-like love of the world; but I would rather look upon the good side of humanity than upon the evil—I turn away from them with sorrow, and pray for mercy upon them.

One solemn fact has struck me with much force, I have, in several instances, found men who promised aid in future, and who, even in my brief Agency, have passed away into eternity with that purpose unfulfilled—"Work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work."

I have found a kind spirit of co-operation on the part of the preachers; to many of whom I am much indebted. The people in and out of the Church, have been almost universally kind to me.

The spirit of improvement in Church buildings is abroad, everywhere creating large local demands upon their liberality, and yet they have not failed to come up to the help of our college.

The day I entered Columbus, Mississippi, they were assembled to take steps for the building of a costly Church, nevertheless they responded kindly to my call.

In Bibb, Baldwin, Shelby, Lowndes, etc., I found, during the present year, the same excellent spirit of liberality which had done so nobly for us elsewhere. At several quarterly meetings, the last of which was for the circuit in Baldwin county, resolutions were passed kindly commending the Agent to the favor of the people.

Grand Result.

In two and a half years I have added above $90,000 to the old subscription, making in all between $110,000 and $150,000; for which I thank God, take courage, and address myself anew to the task, until the subscription shall reach $200,000; where it may then be left for further enlargement by the legacies of the pious.

The East Alabama Male College promises to open well. On the first Wednesday in October, the College exercises will open in one of the most magnificent College buildings into which students were ever invited.

Our College is easily accessible, being directly on the Montgomery and West Point Railroad. The Faculty we have chosen gives universal satisfaction. The President, Rev. Dr. Sasnet, is well known as a great leader in the cause of Denominational Education.

He and his colleagues will make the Auburn College a joy of the Church. We have the promise of pupils for all the College classes at the very opening.

Our course of study will be as full and complete, and our rules and regulations as perfect as any College in the United States.

Board, without washing, can be obtained from ten to twelve dollars a month. On these things I need not dwell, as our Circulars, giving full information, will shortly be distributed.

Resolution of the Board of Trustees.

The Board of Trustees at its recent session, on the eve of launching this great enterprise into active service, solemnly resolved to conform the charter, with regard to the election of Trustees, exactly to the charter of the Southern University at Greensboro; thereby giving to the Alabama Conference precisely the same control over the East Alabama Male College, it has over any Institution in its bounds. A Committee of three, consisting of Rev. O. R. Blue, David Clopton, Esq. and myself, was appointed to carry out this purpose.

This measure will not only fully meet the expectations of the Conference, and satisfy the wishes of the friends of this enterprise, but it will also remove from every Methodist heart the slightest pretext for opposition.

In conclusion, I again ask the brethren to pray that God may make the East Alabama Male College at Auburn a perpetual blessing to the Church and to the world.

E. J. Hamill Agent.

RAILROAD SYSTEM OF INDIA.

We clip the following interesting article from the London Engineer:

The railway system of India includes nearly 5000 miles of lines, a large portion of which is now in construction. Of these, the East India Railway is probably the most important, extending from Calcutta, via Allahabad to Delhi, with a branch from Mirzapore to meet the Great Indian Peninsula line at Jubbalpore—a distance in all of 1400 miles. This line will doubtless be extended also to Lahore, a distance of nearly 1100 miles from Calcutta. Including the portion opened to Cawnpore, 270 miles are now in operation, and 400 miles of the remainder are in active construction. Among the large works in progress on this line is the bridge over the Jumna at Allahabad. The length of this structure, between the faces of abutments, 3,224 feet, divided in fifteen spans of 205 feet each. The iron superstructure is being made by Messrs. Armstrong & Co., of Newcastle. 15,000 tons of rails, sufficient for 150 miles, are now being made for the East Indian Company; and it is probable that a large additional portion of the line will be opened during the present year.

The Great Indian Peninsula line, embracing 1,235 miles, is making equally rapid progress to completion. 130 miles were opened and in use on the first of July last, and of the remainder, 732 miles were under contract, exclusive of the Nagpore branch of 262 miles, which, we believe, has been just let. The northeastern line to Jubbalpore—of which the 556 miles not opened are under contract and in rapid progress—is to be finished by March, 1862. The tremendous works of the Bhore Ghaut will not be completed in much less than two years, or until February, 1861. Including the 21½ miles already in working to the east of Khandulla, this incline is 15¾ miles long, and rises 1831 feet, the average gradient being 1 in 18—1½ miles, however, being as steep as 1 in 37.

Upon the whole length there are twelve tunnels through trap rock, the longest being 437 yards in length and that of the whole being 2535 yards. There are eight viaducts of from 52 to 163 yards in length, and in one instance of 139 feet in height. there are 1,623,102 cubic yards of cuttings, and 1,849,934 yards of embankment; the maximum depth of the former being 80 feet, and the greatest height of the latter 74 feet. The estimated cost of this incline is nearly £600,000, or £11,188 per mile, and its execution will have taken five years. Beyond Khandalla, 42 miles of the line are open to Poonah, and 163 miles more are in construction up to Sholapore. On this portion, and on the Bhore Ghaut, no less than 43,000 laborers, mostly natives, have been employed at the same time.

The Madras line, of a united length of 710 miles—to be increased probably by the construction of additional branches—are also making fair progress; 86 miles between Madras and Goriattum have been for some time in working, and it is expected that from 70 to 80 miles will be opened during the present year from the Malabar coast at Beypoor to Paul Ghaut. On the completion of the bridge at Goriattum, (the present western terminus,) 104 miles of the line will be opened to Salem, a distance of 200 miles from Madras. From Arconam on the trunk line, 42 miles from Madras, the northwestern line will extend for from 320 to 340 miles to meet the Great Indian Peninsula near Bellary, and that portion of the line between Arconam and Caddapa, will be pushed forward as rapidly as possible. An important branch of 80 miles will extend from Vuniembady on the main line to Bangalore. Forty engineers are already engaged upon the surveys of the various lines of the Madras system. The whole of the main line from its present terminus to Beypoor, on the opposite side of the Peninsula, will be finished as fast as the permanent way can be carried up and laid.

The Bombay, Baroda and Central India line of 330 miles, between Bombay and Ahmedabad—is in construction, and 80 miles between Surat and Baroda are ready, with the exception of two bridges, for immediate opening. Rolling stock is being contracted for, to be sent out in the Spring. The surveys for the second concession of 117 miles, from Surat to Vetarnee river, have been completed, and the works will be soon commenced.

The Scinde Railway, of 110 miles, from Kurachee to Kotree, is in rapid construction, and its completion, the Punjaub railway, of 230 miles, from Mooltan to Lahore, with an extension to Umritsir, was commenced in October last. A portion of the Scinde railway was to have been opened by the end of last year, and the Company are now sending out light draught steamers to ply on the Indus to complete the communication between Kotree and Mooltan, a distance of 570 miles. In connection with the Scinde railway, a line has been surveyed also, extending to Peshawar and terminating at the Bolan Pass, with the ultimate object of connecting with a line through Central Asia, and with which a connection with the Euphrates valley railway, from Constantinople will eventually be made. With this connection and completion of the East India line, Calcutta would be but about 5000 miles from London, and the time of transit, by continuous and rapid traveling, would be reduced to seven days.

The Eastern Bengal is an important line, extending eastwardly from Calcutta and of which 108 miles, up to Kooshtee have been let to contract. The line will ultimately be extended to Dacca, and a branch be made to Jessore, whereby the total length will be 300 miles.

The Great Southern or India Railway from Salem, on the Madras Railway, to Negapatam, and southward to Madura and Tinnevelly, is about to be commenced. The cost of the first portion between Negapatam and Trichinopoly has been fixed under the Government guarantee at £500,000 pounds!

The Calcutta and Southeastern Railway, extending to the port at the mouth of the Mutlah river, a distance of thirty miles, is about to be undertaken, also under a Government guarantee. The port of the Mutlah is considered to be very much superior to that of Calcutta, the advantage in shipping cargoes being equal to a reduction of 10s. or 11s. a ton.

It has been announced that the Bengal Government has sanctioned a portion of the Northern Bengal line between Rajmahal and Darjeeling, and that its construction is only a question of time.

A project has been started also for a railway from the mouth of the Godavery river to Nagpore, a distance of 400 miles. The line is to be called the Berar and East Coast of India Railway, and is to have a branch from Nagpore to Hyderabad, and ultimately a connection with the Madras and Bombay trunk lines. The mouth of the Godavery lies midway between Calcutta and Madras, constituting the only harbor on that portion of the coast; and a railway to that point, it is claimed, would give a sea outlet to the cotton of the Nagpore districts, and thus be likely to stimulate the growth of that staple.

In Ceylon, a line of railway is in active construction between Colombo and Kandy.

SKETCH OF GARIBALDI.

Joseph Garibaldi was born at Nice, a city in Piedmont, the fourth of July, 1807. His ancestors from generation to generation had followed the seas, and were always reputable, though not of eminent rank in society. Young Joseph, brought up among sailors and fishermen, early displayed great physical and moral energy, and the qualities he showed in manhood were visible in the child. He was ardent in play as in toil, and ever ready to take the part of the weak against the strong. He studied mathematics at Nice; and his aged teacher, still living, loves to speak of his uncommon progress.

When grown to manhood, he entered the royal navy of Piedmont. He distinguished himself by his coolness and intrepidity. No danger could intimidate him; and when a difficult commission was to be fulfilled, the choice always fell on him.

An insurrection occurring at Genoa in 1834, Garibaldi espoused the patriot cause. His life being threatened, he disguised himself as a peasant, and crossed the Alps on foot into France. He remained two years in Marseilles prosecuting his classical studies. But this quiet occupation did not suit him. He was tired of books, and embarked one morning on board of an Egyptian corvette, to offer his services to the Bey of Tunis. He was received as an officer in the fleet of this Mussulman chief; but he did not remain there long. The brutal despotism of the Turks offended him, and in a few months he left the Bey of Tunis; and not being able then to return to his own country, he went to South America, hoping the New World would open a career to his activity.

His hope was well founded. He was employed by the military government of Uruguay, and appointed commander of the squadron sent against Buenos Ayres. Garibaldi was now in his element, and performed such prodigies of valor that the superstitious inhabitants of the country said of him: "He is not a man, but a devil." They pretend that this stranger escaped miraculously the blows of his enemies, and that he was invulnerable. The people believed that with a handful of soldiers, he could subjugate whole provinces. So, in South America, his name spread terror among his enemies. He formed at Montevideo an Italian legion, which fought against the Dictator Rosas. One day Garibaldi and his band of 300 men was surrounded by 3000 enemies. His position seemed desperate. But Garibaldi let his enemies come within fifty steps of his band, when he rushed upon them and put them to flight. The government of Montevideo decreed that the Italian legion deserved well of the country, and gave them the place of honor in all expeditions.

When the Italians took arms in 1848, Garibaldi hastened back to Nice with a portion of his men. He took part in the war of independence against the Austrians whom he attacked in the Tyrolese mountains. You remember that the unhappy King Charles Albert succumbed under the superior forces of Radetzky.

One city of the Peninsula,—Rome,—still belonged to the friends of independence. Garibaldi went there with his best soldiers, and sustained a long siege against the French troops, who had been sent to succor Pius IX., then shut up in the fort of Gaeta. Marshal Vaillant did justice in his reports to the skill and intrepidity of his adversary. Though Rome was badly fortified, Garibaldi prevented for several weeks the entry of the French. At last, yielding to numbers, and not finding among the Romans the proper energy, he left the city and disbanding his troops, came to Genoa with two hundred men, who would not quit him.

After reposing awhile, seeing nothing to be done in Italy, he returned to America and obtained a command in Peru. It seemed as if he could not breathe but on the battle-field. But dissatisfied with the condition of military affairs in Peru, he returned to Italy, and went with his sons to the small island of Caprera, near the coast of Sardinia. There unable to engage in any military expedition, he turned his attention to agriculture, and drained some wild lands. But he waited impatiently the moment when he might renew the war with Austria.

The time arrived. As soon as symptoms of hostility appeared, Garibaldi went and offered his services to King Victor Emmanuel. He was eagerly received, and placed at the head of volunteers, who flocked from all parts of Italy. He was careful in the choice of his soldiers, and is now engaged actively in driving the Austrians from his native land.

SUN-STROKE—SYMPTOMS AND REMEDY.

The symptoms of sun-stroke generally indicate a constitution previously impaired. Sometimes there is active congestion and apoplectic effusion within the cranium, and in such cases death generally ensues. But more often the signs are those of physical, and, particularly, cerebral prostration; the pulse is feeble, the cheeks, and, in fact, the whole surface of the body, are pale and ghastly. The blood is defective in quality, thus impeding the vital processes. The heart is evidently the organ at fault, having suddenly succumbed under fatigue and exhaustion, though the head gives the first intimations of danger.

This premonitory symptom of sun-stroke mentioned in the first instance is recorded in history, which may be found in the Bible: "And when the child was grown, it fell on a day that he went out to his father, to the reapers. And he said to his father, 'My head! My head!' And he said to a lad, 'Carry him to his mother.' And when he had taken him and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees till noon, and died."—2 Kings, iv., 18, 20. Manasses, also the husband of Judith, the heroine, (chap. vii., 2, 3,) died in a similar manner: "Manasses was her husband, of her tribe and kindred, who died in the barley harvest. For as he stood overseeing them that bound sheaves, in the field, the heat came upon his head and he fell upon his bed, and died in the city of Bethulia."

Convulsions sometimes occur, and in the intervals there are tremblings of the muscles and limbs, not greatly unlike those of delirium-tremens. These are very common in diseases of debility, where the nervous system is largely involved, but generally do not require specific attention. Even during the progress of recovery, there is sometimes considerable mental aberration. The premonitions of an attack are readily recognized. There is a feeling of pressure upon the head, the blood tingles in the vessels, the air seems too hot and tenuous for breathing. A person who was once thus affected tells us that he was cured by immediately bathing the head, arms and shoulders in water. While undergoing this process he experienced a sensation as if burning coals were spread over the whole scalp, but in less than an hour every oppressive symptom had passed away. A brother of the gentleman, similarly attacked, was not so cautious. He fell to the ground insensible, while at labor in the harvest field, and after lingering two or three days, much of the time comatose, and with what a physician mistakenly termed and treated as typhoid fever, was suffered to die. The remedies "laid down in the book" are alcoholic and ammoniacal stimulants; these being "diffusive," and causing an equable circulation of blood throughout the body, and particularly to the surface. The patient is advised to swallow the medicine, but if he is "out of his head," it can be given by enema. Washing the head with cold water, and rubbing liniments upon the surface with the hands, keeping up the friction as long as may be necessary, will generally answer the purpose. When much dullness or stupor remains, coffee and tea are efficacious.

The means of prevention are simple. Persons in sound health are seldom attacked; previous debility, general depression of the vital forces, unusual and excessive physical exertion, violent gusts of passion, excessive drinking of cold water, or of alcoholic beverages, superadded to exposure to the summer sun or a hot fire, create the danger. Careful moderation in these particulars will secure exemption. The Arab, wandering in an arid desert, usually enjoys immunity; his blood is not vitiated by stimulating food or unwholesome drinking. Sir J. Banks spent twenty minutes in an oven where beef was cooking without harm. Fishermen, for the sake of protection, sometimes fill their hats with moist sea-weed; though any large leaves, or even a wet cloth upon the head, will answer as well. This is a valuable preventive, and should be more generally observed by laboring men.

THE GORILLA.

In Dickens's All the Year Round, we find the following description of this animal, which is said to be the most closely allied, in structure, to the human form of any of the brute creation:

The Gorilla is of the average height of man, five feet six inches; his brain case is low and narrow, and, as the forepart of the skull is high and there is a very prominent ridge above the eyes, the top of the head is perfectly flat, and the brow, with its thick integument, forms a scowling pent-house over the eyes. Couple with this a deep, lead-colored skin, much wrinkled, a prominent jaw with the canine teeth—in the males—of huge size, a receding chin, and we have an exaggeration of the lowest and most forbidding type of human physiognomy. The neck is short, the head pokes forward. The relative proportions of the body and limbs are nearer those of man, yet they are of more ungainly aspect than in any other of the brute kind. Long, shapeless arms, thick and muscular, with scarce any diminution of size, deserving the name of wrist—for at the smallest they are fourteen inches round, while a strong man's wrist is not above eight—a wide, thick hand, the palm long and the fingers short, swollen and gouty looking; capacious chest; broad shoulders; legs also thick and shapeless, destitute of calf and very muscular, yet short; a hand-like foot with a thumb to it, "of huge dimensions and portentous power of grasp." No wonder the lion skulks before this monster, and even the elephant is baffled by his malicious cunning, activity and strength. The teeth indicate a vegetable diet, but the repast is sometimes varied with eggs or a brood of young birds. The chief reason of his enmity to the elephant appears to be, not that it ever intentionally injures him, but, merely, that it shares his taste for certain favorite fruits. And when, from his watch-tower in the upper branches of a tree, he perceives the elephant helping himself to these delicacies, he steals along the bough, and, striking its sensitive proboscis a violent blow with the club with which he is almost always armed, drives off the startled giant, trumpeting shrilly with rage and pain.

Toward the negroes the Gorilla seems to cherish an implacable hatred; he attacks them quite unprovoked. If a party of blacks approach unconsciously within range of a tree haunted by one of these wood-demons—swinging rapidly down to the lower branches, he clutches with his thumbed foot, at the nearest of them; his hair stands on end, and the skin above the eyes, drawn rapidly up and down, gives him a fiendish scowl. Sometimes, during their excursions in quest of ivory in those gloomy forests, the natives will first discover the proximity of a Gorilla by the sudden, mysterious disappearance of one of their companions. The brute, angling for him with this horrible foot, dropped from a tree while his strong arms grasp it firmly, stretches down his huge hind-hand seizes the hapless wretch by the throat, draws him up into the boughs, and, as soon as his struggles have ceased drops him down, a strangled corpse.

A tree is the Gorilla's sleeping-place by night, his pleasant abode by day, and his castle of defense. From that colgne of vantage he awaits his foe, should the latter be hardy, or fool-hardy, enough to pursue. No full-grown Gorilla has ever been taken alive. A bold negro, the leader of an elephant-hunting expedition, was offered a hundred dollars for a live Gorilla. "If you gave me the weight of yonder hill in gold, I could not do it," he said.

Nevertheless, he has his good qualities—in a domestic point of view; he is an amiable and exemplary husband and father, watching over his young family with affectionate solicitude, and exerting in their defense his utmost strength and ferocity. The mothers show that devotion to their young in times of danger, which is the most universal of instincts.

The Gorilla constructs himself a sung hammock out of the long, tough, slender stems of parasitic plants, and lines it with the broad, dried fronds of palms, or with long grass—a sort of bed, surely not to be despised—swung in the leafy branches of a tree. By day he sits on a bough leaning his back against the trunk, owing to which habit elderly Gorillas become rather bald in those regions.

DANDIES.

Dandies are not good for much, but they are good for something. They invent and keep in circulation those conventional blank checks or counters just spoken of, intellectual capitalists may sometimes find it worth their while to borrow of them. They are useful, too, in keeping up the standard of dress, which, but for them, would deteriorate and become, what some old fools would have it, a matter of convenience and not as taste and art. Yes, I like dandies well enough on one condition—that they have pluck. I find that lies at the bottom of all true dandyism. A little boy dressed up very fine, who put his finger in his mouth and takes to crying if other boys make fun of him, looks very silly; but if he turns very red in the face, and knotty in the fists, and makes an example of the biggest of assailants, throwing off his fine Leghorn and his thickly buttoned jacket if necessary, to consummate the act of justice, his small doggery takes on the splendors of the crested helmet that frightened Asiyana. You remember that the Daku and his dandy officers were ick's best officers. The "Sandey Blood," the super-superb, sartorial equestrian of our unami Fast-day, is not imposing or dangerous. But such fellows as Brummel, and D'Orsay, and Byron are not to be snubbed quite so easily. Look out for "la main de fer cous la gent de velours." A good many powerful and dangerous people have had a decided dash of dandyism about them.

There was Alcibiades, the "curled son of Clinias," an accomplished young man, but what would be called "a swell" in these days. There was Aristotle, a very distinguished writer, of whom we have heard—a philosopher, in short, whom it took centuries to unlearn, and is now going to take a generation or more to learn over again. Regular dandy he was. So was Marcus Antonius; and though he lost his game, he played for big stakes, and it was not his dandyism that spoilt his chance. Petrarch was not to be despised as a scholar or a poet, but he was one of the same sort. So was Sir Humphrey Davy; so was Lord Palmerston, formerly, if I am not forgetful. Yes, a dandy is good for something as such, and dandies such as I was just speaking of, have rocked this planet like a cradle—aye, and left it swinging to this day. Still if I were you, I wouldn't go to the tailor's on the strength of these remarks, and run up a long bill which will render pockets a superfluity in next suit. Elegans's "nascitur non fet." A man is born a dandy as he is born a poet. There are heads that can't wear hats; there are necks that can't fit cravats; there are jaws that can't fill out collars; (Wills touched this last point, on one of his earlier ambrotypes, if I remember rightly) there are tournures nothing can humanize, and movements nothing can subdue to the gracious suavity or elegant languor or stately serenity which belongs to different styles of dandyism.

THE MODERN ROMAN.

A correspondent of the Democratic Press of this city, writing from Rome, in Italy, says:

A word about the people of Rome. The population numbers 180,000 souls. In the time of Augustus there was nearly one million inhabitants. Society seems to be divided into two classes; nobis and princely families forming the upper, and that numerous body of men whom necessity forces to labor for their daily bread, forming the lower class. In the former class may be included the dignitaries of the Church and State, and many families that boast of being the descendants of princes that flourished during the middle ages. The latter comprise shop-keepers and all others who live at the expense of six thousand strangers. The lines separating one class from another, seems to be less distinctly drawn than any other European capital, and you look in vain for that immeasureable gulf which in England separates the aristocracy from the plebeian. The purse rules here as everywhere. By means of it you may buy a noble title and appear in the first circles of society. Roman Princes are as numerous as millionaires on Fifth avenue, or swindlers in Wall street. Each one has one or more splendid palaces in the city, magnificently furnished, adorned with paintings and statues; and a villa near the city, or in the neighborhood of the Alban Mountains. They remain in town during the winter, and spend the summer in their luxurious country residences, refreshed by the cool shade of groves and arbors, arranged with consummate skill, and listening to the music of fountains and brooks, dream of comfort and contentment. The general routine of life is rarely interrupted. They have no business affairs to attend to, no stimulous to awaken their ambition, and excepting a few literary gentlemen, the only resources they have after their appetites are gratified, is the opera or theatre.

THE EARTHQUAKE AT ERZEROUM.

We have been favoured with the perusal of a letter from Erzeroum, under date of the 3rd of June, announcing an earthquake there at 10:30 A. M. on the day preceding, which in the brief space of from ten to twelve seconds, threw down the better half of this fine and densely populated city, and so seriously injured the rest that the whole will have to be rebuilt, and we regret to add that upwards of 1500 men, women and children are buried in the ruins. In one of the barracks alone, out of an entire battalion, 600 strong, busily employed in cleaning their arms and accoutrements, not more than 350 contrived to save their lives by a precipitate retreat before the walls and roof fell in. Had it not been a feast day (Ascension,) when few people, and particularly Europeans, were in and about the bazaars, we should have had to deplore a considerable greater number of casualities. Not one single European appears to have suffered in life or limb. The line-walls, the barracks, the quarters of the military governor, and a part of the palace of the Pasha or Civil Governor, including his harem, the prison, the public schools, the principal bazaar, many minarets, the Austrian Consulate, Mr. Brandt, are among the buildings which are now reduced to a heap of ruins. The present British, French and Russian Consulates are rendered unsafe for habitation. The entire population has taken to tents and canvas in the plains, fearing further disasters, since, even up to the following night, slight shocks continued to be felt. The shock was from southwest to northeast, of an undulatory motion, and lasted about twelve seconds.—London Times, July 6th.

ELOQUENT EXTRACT.

The best thing yet written by Edward Everett in his "Mount Vernon Papers," is an article on the late comet. After describing its approach to the earth and the beautiful picture it presented, he says:

"Return, then, mysterious traveler, to the depths of the Heavens, never again to be seen by the eyes of men now living! Thou hast run thy race with glory! Millions of eyes have gazed upon thee with wonder—but they shall never look upon thee again. Since thy last appearance in these skies, empires, languages and races of men have died away—the Macedonian, the Alexandrian, the Augustan, the Parthian, the Byzantine, the Saracenic, the Ottoman dynasties have sunk or are sinking into the gulf of ages. Since thy last appearance, old continents have relapsed into ignorance, and new worlds have come out from behind the evil of waters. The Magian fires are quenched on the hill-tops of Asia, the Chaldean is blind; the Egyptian hierogramist has lost his candour; the Oracles are dumb. Wisdom now dwells in the farthest Thules, or in newly discovered worlds beyond the sea. Haply, when wheeling up again from the celestial abysses, thou art at once more seen by the dwellers of earth, the language we speak shall be forgotten, and science shall have fled to the utmost corners of the earth. But even there His hand, that now marks out thy wondrous circuit, shall still guide thy course; and then, as now, Hesper will smile at thy approach, and Arcturus with his sons rejoice at thy coming."

THE LAST OF EARTH.

The Paris correspondent of the Traveler has the following:

Never envy any man! All have their burdens; and He "that tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb," hath endowed habit with the power of alleviating the heaviest loads. The other day there was a splendid funeral in this street, a few doors below the house in which I live. All the hideous pageantry which increases the horrors of death was assembled. The crowd was numerous. The luxurious mansion of the great banker was one great funeral chamber. The banker is worth a million of dollars. His average income is a hundred and twenty thousand dollars. He is the head of a joint-stock banking company, which enables him to dispose of ten millions of dollars at his pleasure. He is one of the lions of "Change." Don't you envy him? O no; don't envy him; he has his sorrows as well as anybody; for it was only six months ago the undertaker laid his third son, then nineteen, in the grave; the other day his second son was carried away by the same sombre tradesman to the graveyard, though the boy was one and twenty. His oldest daughter is a hunch-back, and is in declining health. His second daughter is bed-ridden with consumption, and will surprise the doctors if she outlives the year. The banker himself is blind from over-labor; he has been known to pass twenty days without once undressing and sleeping in a bed; all his repose being a few hours of feverish slumber snatched from corroding cares—a respite passed on a sofa! O I don't envy the rich banker, though his coffers overflow with gold; for it avails little to him; and though, as I grant you, the resonant chime of coin, tossed about as so much trash in his cash office, sounds musically to the ear, and the oft heard passing bell and doctor's tread, common in that house as the resonance of gold, destroy effects, except the painful contrast between the emptiness of human vanity and ambition! So, envy no man!

SUDDEN WHITENING OF THE HAIR.

A correspondent of the Medical Times, having asked for authentic instances of hair becoming gray within the space of one night, Dr. D. Parry, staff-surgeon at Aldershott, writes the following very remarkable account of a case of which he made a memorandum shortly after the occurrence:

On February 19, 1858, the column under General Franks, in the south of Oude, was engaged with a rebel force at the village of Cendia, and several prisoners were taken. One of them, a Sepoy of the Bengal army, was brought before the authorities for examination, and I, being present, had an opportunity of watching from the commencement the fact I am about to record. Divested of his uniform, and stripped completely naked, he was surrounded by the soldiers, and then apparently first became alive to the dangers of his position. He trembled violently; intense horror and despair were depicted on his countenance, and, although he answered the questions addressed to him, he seemed almost stupified with fear. While under observation, within the space of half an hour, his hair became gray on every portion of his head, it having been, when first seen by us, the glossy jet black of the Bengalee; his age about twenty-four. The attention of the bystanders was first attracted by the sergeant, whose prisoner he was, exclaiming, "He is turning gray;" and I, with several other persons, watched its progress. Gradually, but decidedly, the change went on, and a uniform grayish color was completed within the period above named.

REMARKABLE MEANS OF CONVERSION.

When Oliver Cromwell entered upon the command of the Parliament's army against Charles I., he ordered that every soldier should carry a Bible in his pocket. Among the rest there was a wild, wicked young fellow, who ran away from his apprenticeship in London for the sake of plunder and dissipation. Being one day ordered out on a skirmishing expedition, or to attack some fortress, he returned to his quarters in the evening without hurt. When he was going to bed, pulling his Bible out of his pocket, he observed a bullet hole in it, the depth of which he traced till he found the bullet had stopped at Eccl. xi. 9: "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk thou in the ways of thy heart and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment." The words were sent home to his heart by the Divine Spirit, so that he became a sincere believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. He lived in London many years after the civil wars were ended.

MODERN BATTLE.

A battle now, with a hundred thousand determined soldiers on each side, would be the most frightful butchery within a short space of time, ever beheld. The morale of the best troops will not support the sight of more than a certain proportion of their number put hors de combat. Those are good armies that continue an engagement until a quarter of their men are killed and wounded before either side gives way. They may be called famous armies indeed, when they stand more than that. At Inkermann, if I remember well, nearly, or quite one-half of the English troops engaged, were slain or disabled, and still the fight was maintained. But it is a case to which few parallels are to be found, and the English soldier is distinguished above all others for that particular kind of courage, for the extraordinary tenacity and nerve which prevents his knowing when he is beaten, and renders him so dangerous a foe. Probably modern improvements in weapons and ammunition will not cause much greater loss of life in battle than formerly, but the work will be done in a quarter of the time, and the beaten party will suffer more in retreat.

MAKING AUSTRIAN PRISONERS USEFUL.

The Constitutionnel has reason to know that it is the intention of the French Government to employ the Austrian prisoners in making railways in Algeria. It is also said, that the prisoners will be let out to hire to agriculturists and manufacturers who may be willing to pay for them.

If civilized nations allow this, and thus recognise the principle that being seized in war authorizes laborious enslavement, all that will be necessary to solve the "labor problem" will be the declaration of war against Africa. A sufficient number of prisoner-slaves could soon be caught, and the demand supplied. This is not magnanimous in France, thus to put brave white men, taken in lawful warfare, on the same footing with galley and penitentiary convicts guilty of crime.

THE WAR IN ITALY.

The New Orleans Bulletin says, with regard to the war in Italy and the conclusion of it:

What indeed has been accomplished? For what has been this terrible waste of human gore? It is the most extraordinary conclusion of a war, under the circumstances on record, and we apprehend will rather redound to the injury of the man of the Tuileries than to his good.

It appears to us that he has made a great blunder. He should either not have commenced the war, or not have brought it to a termination under the present circumstances. The smoke of Solferino, and the terrible storm that overcast the combatants near the close of the sulphurous day, appear still to rest upon Italy.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Terms—$2 in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 3, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable accomplishment. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

WHERE WILL MACHINERY END?

It is less than a century since inventive genius began to create the era of machinery. In 1767, Arkwright invented a spinning machine. Three years afterwards, Hargreaves took out a patent for his spinning-jenny. In 1785 Crompton completed the mule. Watt gave the steam-engine to the world in 1764 and in 1807 Fulton applied it to navigation. In 1792, Whitney produced the cotton-gin. The first locomotive was built in 1804, and in 1844 the Morse telegraph commenced operations. One hundred years tell the story of these wonders. One hundred years, wakening, quickening, inspiring—flashing their splendors into dark recesses, throwing a radiance more and more luminous over fields broad and rich, and best of all, revealing man to themselves and assuring genius of its competence to conquer material nature. One hundred years have wrought this vast revolution in human industry, and put the mind in an attitude before the physical universe that nearly six thousand years were unable to effect.

Let us be thankful. Let us be joyful. Each age has its work—each generation its own task. Our province is to introduce man into a neglected world and establish his footsteps where no path-way was ever before opened. The past gave us many great ideas and the great fine arts. But it gave us few grand things. It left the curse—all dark and shadowy, with the collected gloom of centuries—on the fair landscape. It was a stranger to the power of a drop of water. It cultivated magic, but not the magic of machinery. It was an alien in the world, and its children were not naturalized in the citizenship of the universe.

And yet, it did a vast work, and did it well. In Luther, Dante, Shakspeare, Milton—in Alfred, Charlemagne, and Cromwell—in Raphael and Michael Angelo, it expressed its depth of sentiment, its fiery will, its soaring thought, its mighty eloquence. But had the world gone on in their footprints! Had the ages followed the opening, they cleft through the darkness! That would have been sad. All the developments would have been of one—all the brightness would have been of one—all the magnificence would have been the intellect, imagination.

[illegible] had to be adjusted—the claims of [illegible] to other earthly wants, had to be [illegible] had to be befriended—the drudgery of labor had to be brightened—and the race [illegible] enjoy the unused bounty, the immeasureable [illegible] of physical nature. Hence came Inventions [illegible] wonders that grasp the practical brain to the [illegible]

And they go on. How they go—one after another! How they thicken and multiply! Invention is abroad—more so than the ubiquitous schoolmaster. Invention is Peter——— with the seven leagued boots, stepping grandly over the world to see what's wanted. Invention is minute—microscopic. It has the attributo of genius, dignity in little things as well as vast. The other day it announced a crusade against flies. How the pests disappear as if an epidemic had broken out among them! And invention is gigantic, forming instruments to sound the sea, to tunnel the mountains, and threatening the Atlantic with a six-days steamship. The circles sweep wider—these circles of creative thought—and unlike the ripples on the water, each one farther on is stronger and mightier. And how they break on the shore, and tell the old rocks strange tidings of coming power!

Here are the sewing-machines. What intelligent creatures they are! With what despach they give you an outfit! "From top to toe" in a few hours—dressed to-night in a suit that just before dinner lay unsuspectingly on the shelves of Jones' Dry Good Store. But what will the poor women do? The needle is taken from their fingers; is the bread taken from their mouths? At first they will suffer. Yet, a good Providence is on their side. Better labor awaits them. Where, we know not. The future will soon show. The age is moving in behalf of womanhood. Thoughful minds are anxious over the problem. It will be worked out. Nothing can hinder it. Toiling, poverty-pinched, suffering, sinking woman will see brighter days. It is time for the needle to cease being the symbol of womanly degradation. Let it go into machinery. The abject class among women will now begin to rise, for it will make its escape from the sordid, heartless tyranny that has so long ground it to the earth. More lucrative employments will yield them remunerance and profit; and the "Song of the Shirt" will wail itself away in the forgotten tones of the past.

And now for the question—where will invention end? Just where the destiny of man, in regard to material nature, ends. Not an iota short of that. It is the conquering spirit of the age, ordained to bring the world in subjection to humankind.

THE EMPIRE OF GOD.

Prof. Mitchell, in closing his series of lectures on Astronomy, said: I must close this long course of lectures. We have passed from planet to planet, from sun to sun, from system to system. We have found other island universes sweeping through space. The great unsolved problem yet remains. Whence came this universe? Have all these stars which glitter in the heavens been shining through eternity? Has our globe been rolling all round the sun for ceaseless ages? Whence, whence this magnificent architecture, whose architraves rise to splendor before us in every direction? Is all the work of chance? I answer no; it is not the work of chance. Who shall reveal to us the true cosmography of the universe by which we are surrounded? Is it the work of the Omnipotent Architect? If so, where is this August Being? Go with me to-night, in imagination, and stand with old Paul, the great Apostle, upon Mars' hill, and there look around you as he did. Here rises that magnificent building, the Parthenon, sacred to Minerva, the Godess of Wisdom. There towers her colossal statue, rising in its majesty above the city, of which she was the guardian, the first object to catch the rays of the rising and the last to be kissed by the rays of the setting sun. And yet, I tell you these gods and these divinities, though created under the inspiring fire of poetic fancy and Greek imagination, never reared this magnificent structure by which we are surrounded. The Olympic Jove never built the heavens. The wisdom of Minerva never organized these magnificent structures. I say with St. Paul: Oh, Athenians, in all things I find you too superstitious; for, passing along your streets I find an altar inscribed, To the unknown God—him whom ye ignorantly worship; and this is the God I declare unto you, the God who made heaven and earth, who dwells not in temples made with hands.'

"No, here is the temple of our divinity. Around us and above us rise Sun and system, Cluster and Universe. And I doubt not that in every region of this Empire of God, hymns of praise and anthems of glory are rising and reverberating from sun to sun, and from system to system—heard by Omnipotence alone, across immensity and through eternity."

THE WORK OF LIFE.

Most truly did Theodore Seilgwick say that it is the man of robust and enduring constitution, of elastic nerve, of comprehensive digestion, who does the great work of life. It is Scott with his manly forth. It is Bronghnm with his superhuman powers of physical endnrance. It is Franklin at the age of seventy, camping ont on his way to arouse the Canadas, as our hardiest boys of twenty now camp out in the Adirondack or on the Miramichi. It is Napoleon, sleeping four hours, and on horseback twenty. It is Washington, with his splendid frame and physical strength.

Why not say it is Paul, "in bodily presence weak." It is Timothy, with his "often infirmities." It is Baxter, never a robust, never a well man. It is the blind Milton. It is Johnson, bravely carrying through life the weight of a diseased and suffering body. It is Channing, with his frail clayey tenement. It is the pale Amos Lawrence, scrupulously weighing from day to day the light morsels of coarse bread which alone his debilitated system allowed him to eat. It is Adolphe Monod, uttering on his death-bed and under the pressnre of torturing disease, words that shall be a power among men in distant lands and in other generations.

A sound body is a good thing, a blessing to be thankful for and to be preserved: but his history is full of the triumphs of the soul over all physical obstacles, including those of weak and shattered frames. If robust health has its advantages, so has the want of it; if there is disability to a certain extent and in a certain form with the latter, the former is the beset with its peculiar temptations, and strong men rush to destruction with no sense of their responsibilities. Of what use is a good body, except as the dwelling place of a better soul? What soul, purified, cultivated, filled with the love of Christ, ever failed to shine like a star, and to be a blessing among men whatever might be the condition of the clod of earth enveloping it? And who does not see that this excellence belongs to a better and higher sphere than Scott's, or Brougham's, or Napoleon's, or Franklin's?

OUR CROPS.

Great crops again! Such are the tidings from most sections of the Union. Farmers and planters are rejoicing—storehouses and barns are full; and, doubtless, if no ill betide us, we shall soon have full purses. But shall we have full hearts?

Full hearts—aye, that is the one true thought. The moral of all this crowned industry is not in the abundance of fields and flocks but in the abundant thankfulness, praise and devoted love, that ought to spring up towards God, and so springing, overflow the soul and gush forth in glad streams to water and refresh all God's earth.

The real harvest of which religion takes knowledge, is the harvest in your souls—farmers and planters; and the measure of its value is not in the yield of acres but in the faith and self-denial with which you receive God's munificent gifts. It would be unworthy of Providence to prosper us merely to put gold in our pockets.

If the sun shone, if the rains fell, if the dews distilled from the encircling air, if the clods changed themselves into food and raiment, only to minister to our earthly gratification—only that we might eat, drink and be merry—then, verily, the whole machinery of nature would encourage an animal sensualism, and degrade us to the level of the beasts that perish. Our corn and wheat, our sugar, rice and cotton are from God, and, moreover, they are for God—not earth's gifts but God's gifts—and they are sent to us as means with which to glorify Him.

No matter what you have made, farmers and planters; you have made a bad crop, a very bad crop, if that crop has not made you better men. Do not look then at your storehouses—the divine storehouse is the heart—how much is within that vast receptacle? How many humble thoughts, gracious feeling, holy vows, earnest and Godly aims, self-sacrificing sentiments, are cherished and garnered there? Every season, heaven utters in the hearing of men, a new proclamation of stewardship. The annual festival of nature brings us near to God's throne, and His voice addresses our souls warning us against covetousness as Idolatry, and beseeching us to remember the day of final account.

Give back your treasures to God. They are never your own so much as when you dedicate them to your Lord. They are never real treasures until so consecrated to Him.

How then shall we know when the country has made a good crop? Not by newspaper estimates—not by cargoes shipped—not by treasury reports. Not by men growing rich and living in stately pomp and debasing luxury. But read the reports of Benevolent Institutions—see what the returns of Church Agencies are—see what amounts are given to Missionary and other good objects. Study these statistics. In them, you can lay your hand on the pulse of the Church, and tell how its heart is beating for Christ.

UNITED STATES AND THE EUROPEAN WAR.

Our insulated position as a great commonwealth—its advantages and opportunities, and all its bearings on national peace and prosperity—were never more clearly seen than at the present time. Amid the violent agitations of Europe—amid its carnage and bloodshed, its interruptions of trade, its suspensions of industry, its financial embarrassments, its international perplexities and confusion—here we are on our broad Continent as calm as our own mountains, as serene as our own beautiful sky, undisturbed by the terrible warfare which is raging in Southern Europe. There is not a plough less in our fields—not a factory closed—because of this desolating strife. We are not indeed callous spectators of this mighty struggle. So far from this, we watch its progress with intense interest; hoping and trusting that it will bring about a better day for the cause of freedom in Europe, and contribute something towards the elevation of its crushed intellect. But—thanks to our position—we are not at all entangled in its bloody strife. Our political freedom is a vast blessing, but let us not forget how much we owe to the freedom of our circumstances—to the freedom of our commercial attitude—and what invaluable aid these things render us in the enjoyment of our institutions. When God determined to develop a peculiar polity among the Israelites, he secluded them from the nations. A wall of fire was thrown around them. The hills and vales of the Land of Promise were as a sheltered sanctuary; and under the shadow of the olive and the vine, the elect tribes, called to a chosen companionship, dwelt in peace and plenty. There is something in our isolated position analogous to theirs. We live apart from the old world. We occupy a world of our own. From East to West, from North to South, over the amplest space of territory, we are undisputed proprietors of a soil that is sufficient in variety, fertility and extent, to support the inhabitants of the globe. If then, on the one hand we prize our political freedom, let us not fall on the other hand to prize it as freedom located on our own continent—in a home of its own—in a home to itself; and let us never forget that the geographical lesson of material nature, no less eloquently taught than the moral lesson of our history, is to be—ourselves—and to work out our own destiny under God's most gracious guidance.

FOOT-PRINTS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

No. III.

Glory of the Prairies in Spring-time—An Emigrant Camp—A Mule-Rabbit Chase—Ears and Horns—Beautiful Rivers; Germans—San Antonio—Dr. Boring—San Antonio River—Cathedral—Alamo.

My recent travel through Texas gratified a wish, long entertained, of seeing a prairie in all the greenness and glory of its vernal beauty. Every former visit had been made in "the sad and melancholy days" of Autumn, or in the dreariness of Winter. This time, the grass was green, the flowers bloomed in beauty, and I remembered with a smile a description once given me by a man who, all aglow with admiration, wound up his account by telling me that the prairie spread out before him, "like a vast sheet of calico."

The floral charms of these plains, I presume, diminish with every passing year. The increasing herds of cattle and horses are destroying both grass and flowers by grazing and trampling; and ill-looking weeds now usurp the ground once covered with more attractive vegetation. In some instances, the Spring blossoms have all disappeared, and only an inferior and very perishable grass remains to cover the nakedness of the earth. In the neighborhood of streams, however, and wherever the topography of the country allows moisture to remain, nature seems to luxuriate in her own loveliness. Such gardens of beauty—such a variety of hues, are no where else to be found. A botanist would explode with enthusiasm; an amateur, albeit ignorant of name, genus or species—who had never heard of stamen, calyx, or petal, would go frantic with delight; and even the rustic soul, though wrapped in the stolidity of a nature which never kindled into emotion, would open his eyes in wonder, and exclaim—"beautiful! beautiful!" I shall not undertake a description—word-painting is not my gift, and my pen is too dull to day for experiment or rash adventure.

An observant traveler sees some strange things In passing from Waco to Austin one day, while the sun was yet high and bright in the heavens, we found the encampment of an emigrant on the road-side. If one family, it was a numerous one. On the ground were seated a man of fifty, and three or four younger men—one or more not out of their teens, all playing cards. The mother and daughter (as I supposed) were mounted upon horses, each with a barrel of good size in her lap, and starting to a creek a mile and a half distant for water. (Whence they came I know not, and would not tell if I did. Nor will I congratulate Texas on such an addition to her population.) Younger children were there—some looking on the game, others rolling in the grass—and I pitied them.

With what ideas of duty, propriety and domestic tenderness must they grow up? The lazy father and loungling brothers regaling themselves with a silly game, while the mother and sister are doomed to drudge and toil for their comfort! The scene was revolting, and my reflections sad. If the gospel does not teach them, what can civilization do for such people?

The whole country from Austin to San Antonio is rich, beautiful and healthy. The crops, where they had not been destroyed by frost, were luxuriant in promise. The dry season had commenced, and the harvest was not yet. The farmers however were cheerful and full of hope. We stopped a few days with my old friend, Gen. Pitts; held a three days meeting at San Marcos, and recruited for the long journey over the plains.

While here, I was induced to go out one afternoon with a company of friends on a rabbit hunt. A fine lot of greyhounds were assembled—besides "Tray, Blanche and Sweetheart, and ours of lower degree." Mule rabbits abound in this region, and are very destructive in gardens and fields. They are about three times as large as the common hare, and it is said exceed in speed, especially when they can find a path or road, any other animal. A greyhound can sometimes catch them on the prairie. Their long ears are very conspicuous, being commonly erect, but when hard pressed in a race they are laid flat upon the back, and then their speed is more like the flight of a bird than the movement of an animal on the ground. In hunter's phrase, we "jumped" a great many; and in every instance when the chances were equal, they escaped. Some two or three, surrounded by dogs and horsemen and frightened into confusion, were captured. The desperate speed with which these Texans follow in the chase was as entertaining to me as the contest between grey-hound and rabbit. One gentleman told me that he measured a pair of ears, eighteen inches from tip to tip.

To those who are fond of curious inquiries, it may be an interesting question: Do food and climate effect the length and size of ears and horns? Mule rabbits are peculiar to open plains, deserts and dry places. They are to be found from the Trinity river to the Pacific coast.

Here, too, especially in Western Texas, the horns of the cattle are extraordinary in length and circumference. I have seen them seven feet from point to point; and was told that occasionally they measured nine. I have seen a pair of elk-horns which I will not venture to describe, for fear some one might suspect me of "spinning a yarn" and breaking the thread.

Along the road to San Antonio, from Austin, there are many beautiful farms, and a thrifty intelligent population. The streams are rapid, bright and sparkling. The San Marcos, Guadalupe, Comal and San Antonio rivers are equal, in what constitutes a watercourse—"a thing of beauty"—to the streams of any other land; verdant banks, overshadowing trees, falls, cascades, deep clear pools, pebbly bottoms, water, now flashing in the sunlight, anon stealing quietly into shadow—here, narrowed to a rushing current—there spread out like a mirror. Verily, they are refreshing to the dust-covered and hent-oppressed traveler.

The Germans are thick in this region; and, it is due to them to say, that they have done more to improve the country than their American neighbors. They have improved the roads, built fine rock fences, reared more substantial houses, surrounded them with more tasteful adornments, and hang out more signs of permanent settlement and domestic content than strikes the eye almost anywhere in the great state of Texas.

New Braunfels, almost exclusively a German town, is a very neat, thrifty, pleasant place. Twilight was fading into darkness as we entered; and, when supper was over and we resumed our journey, the night veiled the people and their habitations, and so my description must end.

We reached San Antonio about two o'clock in the morning, and sought lodging at one of the chief hotels. The establishment is new, and as yet not well ordered, but is destined to be a first class house. Unfortunately for us it was crowded, and the only chance for myself and family was to occupy a bed laid out on the floor of a billiard saloon. This was bad enough; but retiring late, needing rest, it was a great addition to our inconvenience that we were constrained to rise very early. The little sleep we got only mocked our weariness. After breakfast, Dr. Boring, the mentioned preacher, called and informed us that Maj. Neighbors expected and desired us to remove to his house. We availed ourselves of this kindness, and were soon transferred to more comfortable quarters.

It is very agreeable to me to write, and will be very pleasant for his old Georgia friends to hear, that Dr. Boring is well received in his newfield of labor. He has attracted a large and deeply interested audience to the Church he occupies, and has cheering prospects of extensive usefulness. This old city needs him; and, if I may judge from the general testimony in favor of his ministrations, appreciates him.

Protestant Christianity has long been rather a name than an aggressive power here, and it will be well for our Church in this new Conference and for the people, if the talent, experience, and piety of the Doctor may be sanctified for the inauguration of a new era—a long, long season of revival, expansion and progress.

San Antonio is unique in location, form, style of building, population, and, in fact, in every thing. An old Mexican town, it still bears the impress of what is peculiar in the tastes and habits of that singular people. The river which runs through it, is doubtless responsible for the general arrangement of the streets, and while it has given rise to many crooks and turns, ought to be forgiven on the ground that it is the most accommodating river in the world. It runs by every man's door, makes music in his ear, spreads beauty before his eye, invites him daily to the choicest bathing, meets him at every turn in his perambulations through the city, is always welcome—a joy and a blessing. It is a public convenience and a private refreshment, a city ornament and a domestic comfort. The boys angle in its bosom, and the girls gather flowers from its banks—the women admire, and the men boast of it, and the very beasts of the field seem glad of its presence.

We tarried here but a day, and much of my time was taken up in securing an outfit for the wilderness—its wants and perils. Many objects of interest in the town and neighborhood I had to leave without having seen. I intended to enter the old Cathedral, but did not; partly, because my time was short, but mainly, because the ridiculous exterior revolted my taste and my conscience. It is more like a heathen pagoda than a Christian temple, with its towers striped with green and yellow and blue—the most fantastic combinations of color, laid on with clumsy unartistic hands. The charm of antiquity was lost in the miserable, Mexican mimicry of modern improvement. The old tabernacle would be venerable and attractive if they had left it stained with the dust of centuries, and hoary with time and service.

The Alamo is historic, and I stood with some emotion amid its ruins, and thought of the brave Fannin and heroic Crockett, and their fellow soldiers, and of their last desperate, unequal, fatal fight. It was once a fortification, with its barracks and magazines—a Church and a few habitations within the walls. It is now a comparative desolation; the enclosure gone, the Church a warehouse, I believe, and all that gave it fame and fame superceded by that spirit of progress which sacrifices the romantic to the useful; and, if a convenience or economy called for it, would not hesitate to build a horse-stable or cow-stall over the tomb of a prophet.

G. F. PIERCE.

ENGLISH APPREHENSIONS.

The discussion in the English House of Lords, on the night of the 5th inst., relating to the national defenses, has many points of interest at the present time. It was opened by the venerable Lord Lyndhurst, now in his 87th year, in a speech surprising for its fullness and accuracy of information, and for the vigor of its tone. He contended that the defensive condition of England, with regard to France, had been undergoing a great change for the worse. Formerly England's unquestioned naval superiority was an abiding source of confidence, confirmed by the then great difficulty of undertaking aggressive operations on the other side of the Channel without affording ample time for resistance. But now France excelled England in the number of "those important vessels, steam frigates," and in men trained for their service, while the change wrought in navies by steam would enable a fleet to be thrown across the Channel with scarcely a moment's warning. Besides, Lord Lyndhurst maintained, the naval power of France is aggressive in its character, and is constantly augmenting, as it for some ulterior purpose. He had been personally informed "that the French are at the present moment building steamers for the purpose of transporting troops, each of which is being constructed to carry 2500 men, with all the necessary stores." He believed that a French force could be landed on any part of the English coast, in a single night. He thought, therefore, that besides continuing the most vigorous naval preparations, a force of not less than 100,000 regular troops should be kept up for the safety of the country.

"What have we seen within the last few weeks? France, with a peace establishment, with no preparation for war, (a laugh,) no desire for war, a nation that could not reduce it establishment because it had never advanced it (a laugh)—so the Emperor told us, and I am bound to put faith in that statement—was yet able in the short period of five or six weeks to transport an army of 170,000 men to the banks of the Mincio, with 200 pieces of cannon and a siege train, gaining two great battles in its progress, besides other lesser fights, while she has a fleet of fifty war steamers in the Adriatic at this moment, with I believe, an army of 40,000. (Hear, hear.) Cross the opposite coast, then, and you find the power of action, of motion, of hostility, of injury. Are we to sit supine on our own shores, and not to prepare the means necessary in case of war to resist the power? I don't wish to say that we should do this for any aggressive purpose. What I insist upon is that we are bound to make every effort necessary for our own shelter and protection. (Hear, hear.) Beside this, the question of expense and of money sinks into insignificance. (Hear, hear.) It is the price we must pay for our insurance, and it is but a moderate price for so important an insurance.

Those who followed Lord Lyndhurst, with scarcely an exception, supported his defensive recommendations, though all did not share his anxieties. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe said "the speech afforded a strong proof of the feeling prevailing throughout the country," and that it did not exaggerate the naval and military means of France. He did not, however, think there was any immediate danger of invasion. The Earl of Granville doubted the policy of such discussions, as they influenced whatever hostile feelings might exist abroad, and lead to capricious measures at home. Speaking in behalf of the Government, he said England was steadily arming, and must continue to do so, in order to acquire the requisite influence in the counsels of Europe when the proper opportunity comes for restoring peace. The Earl of Hardwicke declared that the sooner the ministry came to the conclusion that "the low water mark of the French shore was the natural line of defense of this country, the better for all parties." He was for the most energetic preparations. The Duke of Somerset deprecated such language, but thought the armaments ought to be steadily increased. Lord Brougham came to the same conclusion, while warmly acquitting the French people of any hostile disposition. Lord Ellenborough repeated his belief that the pretended object of the present war is not its real one; he was, therefore, apprehensive of the safety of England, and feared that the Government was not up to the demands of the crisis. The Duke of Argyle warmly dissented from the assertion that the present war was "an iniquitous war on the part of France and Sardinia." The debate was closed by the Duke of Rutland, who, in connecting the present outbreak with previous European disturbances said: "Who, with those facts before his eyes, could be so bold as to say that there was no possibility of England being invaded by France?"

THE FIELD AFTER THE BATTLE.

Mr. Raymond, of the New York Times, visited the Solferino battle field two days after the conflict was over, and speaking of the scene it presented, says: Not one of the killed whom I observed had his hat on—all were bareheaded, and many were without their coats. Muskets, some broken, but most of them quite unharmed, lay scattered all over the field. Cartridges amassed in immense quantities were strown about—balls of all kinds could be picked up everywhere, though many had sunk into the earth; ramrods, bayonets, priming tubes, and all the little utensils of war lay around; bits of torn clothing, gloves, belts, pocket combs such as soldiers carry, and great quantities of letters were strewn about in every direction. A surface of level ground, embracing, according to the best estimate I could make, not less than six square miles, was densely covered with these ghastly relics of the fight. I could not spend much time in traversing the field, for the bodies, owing to the intense heat, were in an advanced stage of decomposition, and the stench was overpowering. But as I went along I picked up a cannon ball and a bayonet, which I hope, in due time, may reach the Times office, and serve as memorials of the day. It would have been easy to collect cart loads of both.

Of the mulberry trees in the orchards which form a considerable portion of the field, probably more than half escaped without being touched at all. Some were cut down entirely by large cannon balls, and others showed scars of shot upon their torn bark. I saw one tree, about six inches in diameter, in which a twelve pound shot had completely imbedded itself, the wood of the tree having closed over the ball, leaving only a small part of its surface visible, and leading one to wonder how so large a ball could possibly have found admission through so small a hole.

At one point, by the side of the road, ten or fifteen peasants were burying the dead. They gathered them from the field upon hand-barrows, from which they were rolled into the hollow places on the road-side from which gravel had been taken to repair the track; and after five or six, or as many as the space would hold, had been tumbled in, a foot or two of dirt was shoveled over them. No attempt was made to remove any of their clothing, or to lay them side by side, or in any particular position. They were tumbled in just as it happened, and were covered up just as they chanced to fall. In many cases they were laid longitwise, in single file, and then covered over, a second row being then put in, then a third, a fourth, etc. In this way over 200 had been buried in a single place. It will take a long time to dispose of all the dead, and the carcasses of the horses also; and if this excessively hot weather continues, the health of the vicinity cannot fail to suffer.

THE NEW KING OF SWEDEN.

The late King Oscar, of Sweden, leaves four children. Prince Charles Louis Eugene, Duke of Scania, who was born in 1826, and is now King of Sweden; Prince Oscar Frederick, Duke of Ostrogotha, born in 1829, and for several years Commander of the Swedish Marine Forces: Princess Charlotte Eugenie Augusta Amelia Alherting, born in 1830; and the Princes Nicholas Augustus, born in 1831.

The Crown Prince, who will now probably assume the title of Charles XV., was married in 1850 to the Princess Wilhelmina Frederica Alexandria Anna Louisa, a daughter of the royal house of Holland, and several children, grandchildren of the late King, are the issue of this marriage. The new King's education is purely Swedish, and his intellectual acquirements are said to be considerable. He enters upon the rule of a prosperous and peaceful kingdom, and only has cause to fear for his Norwegian provinces.

Norway has for ages belonged to Denmark, and the Norwegians are closely related to the Danes, by race and traditions, and above all, by that great bond of sympathy—a common language. Until 1814 Norway was part of the Danish kingdom, but the European changes caused by Napoleon I. resulted in the forced cession to Sweden, by Denmark, of all her Norwegian provinces. It is true that from its geographical position it would appear more natural for Norway to belong to Sweden; but notwithstanding this, as far as legitimate right and popular desire go, it really belongs to the Danish crown.

Bernadotte had a great difficulty to retain his Norway possessions. The Norwegians themselves were averse to his rule, and attempted to establish an independent kingdom, but the effort failed. Of late years both Danes and Norwegians seemed resigned to the change, and the Bernadotte dynasty, which, till recent events, appeared to be the only one of the Napoleonic dynasties in which vitality remained, promises yet to rule, for a long time, the wild romantic provinces of Scandinavia.

A DAY OF HEAVEN UPON EARTH.

O Sabbath!—needed for a world of innocence—without thee what would be a world of sin? There would be no pause for consideration, no check to passion, no remission of toil, no balm for care! He who had withheld thee, would have forsaken the earth! Without thee, he had never given to us the Bible, the Gospel, the Spirit! We salute thee as thou comest to us in the name of the Lord—radiant in the sunshine of that dawn which broke over a nation's achieved work—marching downward in the track of time, a pillar of refreshing cloud and guiding flame, interweaving with all thy light new beams of discovery and promise, until thou standest forth more fair than when reflected in the dews and imbibed by the flowers of Eden—more awful than when the trumpet rang of thee in Sinai! The Christian Sabbath! Like its Lord, it but rises in Christianity, and henceforth records the rising day. And ever since the tomb of Jesus was burst open by him who revived and rose, has this day awakened but as the light of seven days, and with healing in its wings! Never has it unfolded without some witness and welcome, some song and salutation! It has been the coronation day of martyrs, the feast of saints! It has been from the first until now the sublime custom of the Church of God! Still the outgoings of its morning and its evening rejoice! It is a day of heaven upon earth! Life's sweetest calm, poverty's birthright, labor's only rest! Nothing has such a hoard of antiquity on it! Nothing contains in it such a history! Nothing draws along with it such a glory. Nurse of virtue, seal of truth! The household's richest patrimony, the nation's noblest safeguard! The pledge of peace, the fountain of intelligence, the strength of law! The oracle of instruction, the ark of mercy! The patent of our manhood's spiritual greatness! The harbinger of our soul's sanctified perfection! The glory of religion, the watch-tower of immorality! The ladder set upon the earth, and the top of it reacheth to heaven, with the angels of God ascending and descending upon it! [Hamilton.]

CRUELTY AT SEA.

The New York Commercial thinks it about time there was some sort of arrangement with foreign nations, looking to the punishment of cruelty on the high seas. As things stand now, we are told:

It is a principle of international law that the authorities of a port at which a vessel may arrive, are powerless to punish for crimes that may have been committed during the voyage. This amounts to immunity on the part of an officer, who may visit his helpless crew with abuse and outrage, when beyond the three miles which are supposed to limit the reach of shore law. If the case occurs in our port, the offender may be punished. Our consular regulations, and doubtless they do not differ from other nations, provide that in case an American citizen is charged with a crime committed at sea on an American vessel, the individual accused may be sent home by the consular officer for trial.

But, practically, this regulation is limited to murder, piracy, robbery, and the like, under the extradition treaty of 1842. The result is that ordinary assaults, and, indeed, assaults of an aggrevated nature, pass unnoticed. In 1856, a case of manslaughter was decided by the British Home Office, not to fall within the letter of the treaty. But even in cases where a shipmaster or officer can be sent home, punishment is often frustrated by the absence of witnesses, who may be sailing upon distant seas when their presence is needed at the trial. The witness cannot be forced to accompany the prisoner.

THE NORTHERN MAIL.

According to official notice, bids will be received up to the 17th of August by the Post Office Department at Washington for the transportation of the great through mail between Portland, Maine, and New Orleans, and it is understood that a proposal has been, or will be made to transport the mail by what is known as the "Fernandina Route," viz: by railroad between Portland and Charleston, thence by steamer to Fernandina, thence across Florida by railroad to Cedar Keys, thence to New Orleans by steamer. We have seen a memorial to the Postmaster General, says the Bulletin, numerously signed by the citizens of New Orleans, setting forth some forcible objections to this new route. This circular proves conclusively that if the Fernandina route is intended as a substitute for the one over which the mail is now carried, it will result in great inconvenience, delay, and loss to the commercial interests of the country. The gap in the Mississippi Central Railroad will, we are informed, upon reliable authority, be filled by the first of January next, when the distance between New Orleans and New York will be accomplished in three days and a half. The "Fernandina route" includes upward of seven hundred miles of sea navigation which cannot be performed, even in good weather, in less than three days, and the carriage by railroad also over this route, will require two and a half or three days more, making the time between New Orleans and New York not less than five and a half or six days. From this statement, an idea of the comparative merits of the two routes can be obtained. We hope that the circular referred to above will have the desired influence with the Post Office Department at Washington.

INTEREST IN EDUCATION.

One of the most gratifying facts that we have recently observed, is the increasing degree of attention which the newspaper press is devoting to educational reports and statistics. Within a few weeks past, nearly all newspapers, both secular and religious, have given a large portion of their columns to the details of Commencements, Examinations, and other interests of education.

It strikes us, that we have never seen so many proofs of a general solicitude on this subject. Thinking men have always felt the vast importance of education. But society, as a body, never improves much until the thoughts of the few become the thoughts of the many; and this is the point we have attained in connection with the cause of learning. No man can doubt that there is now a popular sentiment, strong and deep, in behalf of education; and the most encouraging feature of this sentiment is its religious aspect. The great truth, that man ought to be educated in view of his immortal manhood and not simply as a creature of business and civil relations, is making its way into the depths of many hearts. It is a truth that God will bless. If the Church of Christ will open her soul to its influence, she will go forth with new power on her career of usefulness.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON'S MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.

The Emperor's miraculous escape with the loss of his epaulette has been explained. The shot which shattered General Auger's arm, carried off his epaulette. The General, being brought to the rear, encountered the Emperor, who had a kind and cheering word for everybody during the fight. Seeing the General's forlorn plight, he unbuttoned one of his own epaulettes and placed it on General Auger's shoulder, thereby creating him a General of Division on the spot. Such is the version given of this extraordinary incident. The Emperor, on being seen riding about with one of his "wings," was supposed to have been deprived of the other by a cannon ball; but had such been the case, the windage alone would have seriously injured him.

VISIT THE FATHERLESS AND WIDOW IN THEIR AFFLICTIONS.

This is a part of pure religion, says the Nash. C. Advocate. But O, how many professed Christians and ministers of the Gospel neglect this important duty! There are widows and fatherless children deeply afflicted, to whom no word of comfort is ministered by the pastor having their spiritual oversight.

There is Sister———, whose house has long been the home of the preacher, and who has not been able to attend the house of God this year. She has gone through the fiery furnace recently, but her pastor has not been near her habitation to console her in her hours of trial. What a pity that the flock should be neglected, and the under shepherd lose his reward! We give such a text:

"That pity I to others show,
That pity show to me."

ENCOURAGING.

The Nash. Christian Advocate, says: In no one particular has there been greater improvement in this country than in the building of houses of worship. It is truly refreshing to witness the erection of so many neat and comfortable Churches. The country, if possible, is taking the lead in this matter. Twenty-five years ago you seldom saw a spacious, well-finished, well-arranged house of worship; but now you see them rising up in almost every direction. This argues well for the moral tone and sentiment of the people; and while good houses will attract large congregations, where God can be worshipped without distraction, they indicate a permanency in the congregations of the people.

The Church and the school-house are unmistakable indices to the state of civilization and intelligence of the community.

Two Cases of Yellow Fever are reported, but the authority is doubtful, as there is none in the Charity Hospital, where it always first appears. These cases will be faithfully examined, and reported.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

The New Orleans School of Medicine has an advertisement in the fifth column of the third page of this paper which is worthy of the attention of all who intend to study the science of medicine and the art of healing. New Orleans offers unusual facilities for the attainment of medical knowledge, and the New Orleans School of Medicine has a fine faculty, and all appropriate advantages.

East Alabama Male College, Auburn, Ala., as will be seen by advertisement, fifth column of third page, opens with October next, with an imposing faculty, a splendid building, and the prospect of a large number of students. The endowment is a certainty, and it will be a success from the beginning.

Sharon Female College, Sharon, Mississippi, belongs to the Mississippi Conference, and is one of the oldest and most trustworthy institutions of the South-west. President Gard has an advertisement on third page, fifth column. It deserves well of the Mississippi Conference.

Trinity College, North Carolina, under President Craven, presents quite an attraction to the people of the low country, in health, cheapness, mental, moral, and social anvantages, as will be seen by the advertisement on third page, fifth column.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Grand Gulf Station.—Rev. R. W. Lambuth writes: "On the Sabbath in May I took up a collection in the white congregation for the especial benefit of my Brother in China. Received $131; in promise, $25; and it has been forwarded to him by mail. Through solicitation, I took, for the same purpose, a collection in the colored Church, and received $21. May God bless the kindness of this people, for their liberality. The Presbyterians aided in this—thanks to them also. Brother Wiggins was with me the first Saturday and Sunday in the month, and continued with us until the Friday following, during which time, he delivered many heart-searching sermons. Brothers House and Briggs were also laboring with us with zeal and earnestness.

After the departure of our beloved Presiding Elder, we closed the meeting. At the expiration of the second week, the members, but two accessions to the Church—Brother S. T. Gray, one of our principal citizens, and daughter. Attendance during the day varying from six to twenty-five, at night, from fifteen to one hundred—during the week. Attendance good on Sabbath. Thanks to Brother Montgomery, the Presbyterian minister, for his services. At the beginning of the second week, Brother Briggs, bid adieu. Tuesday night—our last sermon. Wednesday night, the same mourner, who, in connection with her mother, united with us. Thursday morning, God gave us peace to her soul. Three clear conversions among the children, and several accessions to the Church. We were called upon to bid adieu to Brother B. this morning. Thanks to our heavenly Father—he was not permitted to leave without hearing the shouts of happy souls, and the welcome news of conversion to God; taking with him a cup full of joy. I am left alone—I will not give up yet.

Come to my help! for the Lord is with us reviving his work, and daily increasing the interest of our meetings. Come, brethren, to the aid of your Christian brother."

Vicksburg Circuit.—Rev. J. R. Bowen writes: "We have had a meeting in Magnolia, embracing the first Sabbath in June, which continued five days, we had the help of Brother Lewis, of your city, and Brothers Nicholson and Sandle. All, in the absence of the great commission, labored for the good of the cause, who were much interested and edified by their preaching. Our congregations were large, and seemed to be easily moved by the preaching of the word—there were six accessions to the Church.

The last night of the meeting, a large number of mourners around the altar, deeply pealteut and seeking for mercy. We trust to have a time of greater refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

We also held a meeting of some interest at Shiloh. The Church was refreshed, and three were added to the Church.

We ask the prayers and sympathy of the Church. We are called upon to part with our loved and only daughter, Ida. Who has any sympathy for a poor itinerant and wife, know they must bury their only child. Brother Editor, have I ever lost a lovely daughter."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Vicksburg Circuit.—Rev. T. H. McClendon writes: "Perhaps the friends of Methodism will be greatly rejoiced to hear that we have at last got a good, neat, church-edifice on Delty Island. Last Saturday and Sunday, we held our third quarterly meeting in it; and it was dedicated to God, by Rev. Lee, our Presiding Elder. And God accepted the gift. There was conversion, one accession, and many felt their need of Christ. May the 'seed sown,' germinate, and in a future world bring forth a plentiful 'harvest.'

We have also about $1600, in good subscription, to build a church in Bceuff Prairie, and hope soon to see a Temple erected in that will give credit to the country. And a third, some value, is being erected in a hitherto less cultivated portion of the country, and will be the first 'Temple,' Dedicated to God, in that part. May the Spirit continue to spread.

Delty Island Mission (connected with this circuit) is served this year by Brother Green, and has ever been in a healthy condition. Up to this date, he has taken in thirty-one on probation—had thirty Conversions, and, at every appointment two, there is a revival now going on."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Moscow.—Rev. W. L. Thompson writes: "We have closed our third Quarterly meeting for this circuit, which lasted thirteen days, held at Moscow. Took up a missionary collection on Sunday. Eighty-three dollars paid and subscribed. We have caught the missionary spirit up here. I have paid and subscribed, about $140. Forty professed religion. Thirty-nine joined the Church. Membership greatly blessed. We are praying for and expecting a great revival, generally. I have fifteen appointments, and sixteen Sunday-schools—and most of them are doing well."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

London, July 13.—The Emperors had an interview at Villafranca on the 11th inst.

A despatch from Turin says Napoleon issued a bulletin from Bergio, announcing the armistice, congratulating the troops on their exploits, and announcing his immediate departure for Paris, leaving the provisional command of the army with General Vaillant.

A despatch from Verona says that the armistice was concluded only after requests from the French, and after Austria had obtained all she asked.

The London News says that the hopes and expectations of many have been deceived, and that history will call Napoleon to account for making a war upon false pretense, and then signing a mock and selfish peace that leaves Austria impregnably fortified in the heart of Northern Italy, and connects Central Italy with the patronage of the Pope.

The London Times says that France has spent fifty million pounds and lost fifty thousand men, only to give Milan a Piedmontese master and establish the Pope in temporary dignity; far beyond his imagination.

London, July 16.—Letters from Paris note great discontent concerning the terms of peace. The Siecle objects to suffering Austrian influence still to remain in Italy, and demands the expulsion of the petty Italian Princes, confederates of Austria.

The populace of Paris are indignant at the Emperor for failing to fulfill his promises.

It is rumored that the Emperor and Eugenie will soon make a visit to Vienna.

Paris, July 16.—Intelligence has been received that troubles had arisen at Milan, and great agitation prevailed. Venetia and Florence were disturbed.

London, July 21.—A telegram from Paris announces that a peace conference is to meet at Zurich, in Switzerland, in the course of about ten days, for the purpose of settling the details of the peace recently concluded between the Emperor Napoleon and the Emperor of Austria. The French Government is to be represented by Monsieur De Bourgueney. The Austrian Government is to be represented by Count Colowredo.

The correspondents of the London journals state that the greatest activity prevails along the whole French coast of the Channel, between Cherbourg and Dunkirk, a distance of 200 or 300 miles.

Orders have been issued from the war office for the construction of batteries at not more than 3000 yards distant from each other along the entire distance, and the work is already in rapid progress.

The intelligence from some parts of Italy indicates great discontent with the manner in which peace has been concluded between Francs and Austria, and the settlement proposed for Italy.

There was great agitation at Florence in consequence of the announcement that the Grand Duke was authorized to return and again resume the reins of Government.

The Provisional Government of Tuscany has unanimously declared that they will not be replaced under the rule of an Austrian Arch-Duke.

The Russian organ at Brussels, Le Nord, says that a French corps of 40,000 is to remain in Italy until the re-organization of the country is completed; according to the treaty of Villafranca.

The disaffection in the Papal States owing to the massacre of Perugia has increased to such an extent that the Sardinian troops have been sent into Romagna to counteract the effect of the conduct of the Swiss guards.

The King of Sardinia has taken this step with the full consent of the Emperor Napoleon.

The most important towns in the Roman States have sent deputations to confer with Garibaldi as to what policy they shall pursue in the present condition of affairs in Italy.

The Duchies of Modena and Parma are in a state of revolt.

The Austrian troops still remain in their position within the fortifications of Verona.

The Provisional Government of Tuscany and Modena are organizing a force to oppose the return of their former petty sovereigns.

The announcement of the terms of peace produced the greatest exasperation and defection at Turin.

The Emperor Napoleon is openly accused of being a traitor to the cause of Italian Independence, and to have crushed the hopes of those who put faith in his sincerity of purpose.

The Prince Regent of Prussia expresses entire satisfaction with the terms of the treaty of peace and the conclusion of the war at the present crisis.

The Russian General, Wrangle, has been removed from the command of the army of the Rhine.

Great military activity prevails in Naples, and large bodies of troops are being concentrated.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Yellow-Fever at Havana.—On the 18th inst., the yellow fever was prevailing to a considerable extent, but was of a very mild type.

Messrs. Wason & Co., car builders of Springfield, Mass., have received an order from the Pasha of Egypt for $50,000 worth of passenger cars, two of which are to be furnished in Oriental style, for the Pacha himself.

American Officers in Italy.—"Malakoff," writes from Milan to New York Times:

We met several American officers a few days ago at Brescia, on their way to the Sardinian camp, bearing letters from Count Cavour. Their names were Major Crittenden, Capt. Todd, and Lieut. Pegram. A son of Gov. Wright, of New Jersey, was also of the party. Capt. Towers and Lieut. Carr have been some days in the Piedmontese camp. Major Kearney, until now in the staff of Gen. Morris, in the French camp, left the hotel at which I write, this morning, for Paris.

Large Incomes in England.—There are forty-six persons in England who have incomes of £450,000 a year, equal to two millions and a quarter dollars, while four hundred and forty-four persons have incomes ranging from fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year, and eight hundred and eleven from twenty-five thousand. In Ireland there is but one person who has an income of upwards of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; twenty-one have incomes ranging from fifty thousand to two hundred and fifty thousand, and thirty from twenty-five to fifty thousand dollars.

The Chinese Mission.—The Navy Department is in receipt of official despatches from Commodore Tattnel, of the frigate Powhatan. She was then, the third of May, at Singapore, on her way to Hong-Kong, with Hon. John E. Ward, United States Minister to China, on board.

DOMESTIC.

Fine Crops.

Mr. Wm. Goode in a letter of the 18th instant, dated Wheeling Winn parish says: "We have the best promise of crops in this neighborhood that we have had for years. The country is healthy.

Alabama.

On the 17th inst., a severe storm passed over Decatur, which entirely demolished eight spans of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad bridge. The loss is estimated at fifteen thousand dollars.

A man who had taken shelter in the bridge was instantly killed by falling timbers. He was a machinist from Nashville, Tennessee; by the name of Thomas Cary. The storm lasted about one hour, uprooting trees, carrying roofs from the houses—etc.

The vicinity of Eutow was visited on the 15th inst., by heavy rain, and hail, and very high winds, seriously damaging the young crops—accompanied by considerable lightning and thunder, from which cause Col. Dew lost a valuable negro man. On Sunday the rain poured down between two and three hours, washing and tearing the lands very much.

Robert H. Baker, Postmaster at Summerfield, Alabama, was struck by lightning while standing near the window in his store on Wednesday, the 20th.

The Columbus Times of Friday last says: We learn that during a thunder storm on Saturday afternoon last, about a dozen negroes, belonging to Mr. F. M. Higgers; living seven miles north of this city, took refuge in a house in his field, and that the house was struck by lightning, killed two of the negroes instantly and severely injured two others. There was a very heavy fall of rain in that neighborhood.

A friend from Harris county writes us that four negroes were killed and others wounded.

The Camden Republican says: Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last, were beyond a doubt the warmest three consecutive days we have had in a long time. The thermometer raised from ninety to one hundred degrees during the day. Crops generally, we learn, are doing finely. In some sections of the county we hear that the planters have suffered from dry weather, and in others they complain of too much rain. The corn crops are pretty good so far, and the cotton prospect is gladdening to the planter.

The Claiborne Champion says: For the last few days we have been blessed with most abundant rains and distressingly hot weather, in the morning baked by the sun and in the afternoon stewed by the rain. Our farmers complain of an superabundance of grass, with poor prospects of reducing the quantity, as their lands are generally too wet to plough. The crops are still fine.

LOCAL.

An Admirable Thing was done, says the Crescent, by the engineer of the locomotive at the Pontchartrain Railroad depot. The locomotive was coming out of the depot at its usual rate of speed, when a blundering draryman drove on the track in front of it. A terrible smash and a loss of life were apparently inevitable, and the hearts of a hundred people jumped to their throats. The engineer, as soon as he saw the danger, sprang to his post and reversed the engine, so suddenly and with such force, that whilst the momentum of the locomotive kept it ahead, the wheels slipped on the track and spun the other way. The ponderous machine stopped just as it reached the tail of the retreating dray. It was the incident of only a few seconds, but it was exciting, and the activity and success of the engineer were much admired.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, August 1, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 30th instant: The market generally, during the past week, has remained under the usual stagnation of summer dullness, but it will be seen that our leading staple, Cotton, has been an exception to the general inactivity, quite an animated impulse having been given to the demand by advices of an armistice between the belligerent powers, and the subsequent news of the signing of a treaty of peace. Under this revived demand, improved prices have been realized, and encouragement and confidence have been imparted to commercial and financial affairs generally.

On Saturday morning European advices to 9th instant, report an armistice between the belligerent powers, and a suspension of hostilities until the 15th August, with strong hopes of peace. Cotton has been favorably influenced and, an advance of 1-16d had been realized at Liverpool, the week's sales amounting up 70,000 bales, the market closing with an advancing tendency. The quotations were 8½d for Fair Orleans and 7d for Middling Uplds, and the total stock on hand, at Liverpool was stated at 725,000 bales, of which 333,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester were favorable, and all qualities of goods had considerable advanced. At Havre the Cotton market was firm, and tres ordinaire was quoted at 108 francs. The public funds generally had improved, and Consols had advanced to 95 to 95¼. On Monday advices received by the steamer Northumbrian from Liverpool to 13th inst., report an active Cotton market at Liverpool, the sales for three days being 32,000 bales, at a farther advance of 1-16d. Just on the eve of the steamer's leaving, and before the effect could be developed, the very important intelligence was received that a treaty of peace had been concluded between Austria, France and Sardinia, and the immediate effect on the public funds was an advance of 2½ per cent at Paris, and 4 per cent at London, Consols having been sold at 99¼. On Wednesday the Europa's advices were received confirming the news of peace, and reporting an advance of ¼ to ¼ in the Liverpool Cotton market, with sales for the week of 107,000 bales, and giving 7¾d as the quotation for Middling Orleans. In the Havre Cotton market, also, there had been an advance of 2 to 3 francs, tres ordinaire being quoted at 112 francs, with sales for the week of 12,000 bales. The Bank of England has reduced the rate of discount to 2½ per cent and Consols had fallen back to 95½ to 95¾.

COTTON.—Our last report left the Cotton market almost without movement, but on Saturday morning the Africa's advices reported an improvement in the Liverpool market, and an animated demand between the belligerent powers gave quite an impulse to the demand in our own market, and the sales reached some 3500 bales. On Monday a still more active impulse was given to the demand, by the North Briton's advices, reporting peace concluded, and the sales summed up fully 5500 bales. On Tuesday there was again a fair enquiry, but with a very meagre stock, and more full prices generally obtained, only a few small lots were disposed of, barely amounting to 1000 bales. On Wednesday some buyers came forward, and had taken about 2300 bales, when the Europa's advices were announced, reporting an advance of ¼ to ½d in the Liverpool market. This advance came upon so meagre a supply in our market that the few buyers could find the qualities solicted to their orders to but a limited extent, and thus the sales of Thursday were confined to barely 1000 bales, and those of Friday to about 500 bales; making a total for the week of 13,800 bales, and since last September, (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,654,194, bales against 1,557,241 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 7013 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 29th last., 22,918. With respect to prices, we have to state that a full ½d advance was realized at the first impulse given to the demand in the early part of the week, but since then there has been no further marked improvement, though if lists of even-running Middling were obtainable they would command something above our outside figures. Of such lists, however, the market is bare, and the whole stock unsold in factor's hands is estimated not to exceed 10,000 bales, the bulk of it being low-ruuing mixed lists, for which there are few or no buyers.

On Thursday, 28th inst., three bales of the new crop, the first of the season, were received from Texas. One bale classed Good Ordinary to Low Middling, stained, and the other two near Middling, with good color, staple, &c., and one of these was sold yesterday at the fancy price of 13½ cent per pound. The first receipt last year was on the 25th of July, and also from Texas.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

Married on 7th ult. in Prattville, at the residence of the bride's brother, W. M Northington, Esq. by Rev. John D. Fisher, Mr. PHILIP G GOLSON of Autauga county to Miss ARGYRA NORTHINGTON of Virginia.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

Work for Little Girls to do.

Mr. Editor: I know of a town in which a Christian lady has lately formed a number of little girls into a "Sewing Circle," to earn some money with their needles. They propose to put this money into my hands to buy books for the poor children in Sunday-schools, where they are not able to buy them for themselves.

A beautiful example! We commend it as worthy of imitation by all the little girls in every city, town, village, and neighborhood, in the land.

It has three admirable features. First—It trains the little girls themselves to habits of industry. Let the grown-up ladies encourage them in their work, by giving them sewing to do, and paying them the money for the Sunday-school cause.

Second—It trains them to the exercise of benevolence—of doing good—a most lovely trait in female character, and one that should, by all means, be cultivated, early in life, in order to anticipate and prevent the growth of selfishness.

Third—It confers great benefit upon those who receive the favors thus procured. Almost any such society of little girls can make, at the very least, ten dollars a year; and that sum will purchase quite a respectable library for a poor Sunday-school. But some can make a hundred dollars a year very easily. That would be only two dollars per week. Now suppose twenty little girls should meet together, one afternoon in each week, with some kind grown lady to superintend their work, could they not, by what they might do there, and then at intervals during the week, at home besides, make ten cents each every week? That would be one hundred dollars a year!

What say you, my little friends. Will you have a Sunday-school Sewing Circle where you live? Write to me about it here at Columbia, S. C. Your friend,

CHARLES TAYLOR,
Cor. Sec. S. S. Society, M. E. Church, South.

"In thee do I put my trust."

"Mother, what did the Psalmist mean when he said, 'Preserve me, O God! for in thee do I put my trust?'"

"Do you remember the little girl we saw walking with her father in the woods last week?"

"O yes, mother; wasn't she beautiful?"

"She was a gentle, loving little thing, and her father was very kind to her. Do you remember what she said when they came to the narrow bridge over the brook?"

"I do not like to talk about the bridge, mother, it makes me giddy. Do you believe it safe—just those two planks laid across, and no railing? If she had stepped a little to one side she would have fallen into the water."

"Do you remember what she said?"

"Yes. She stopped a minute, as if she did not like to go over, and then looked up in her father's face, and asked him to take hold of her hand, and said: 'You will take care of me, father dear; I don't feel afraid when you take hold of my hand.' And her father looked so lovingly upon her, and took tight hold of her hand, as if she were very precious to him."

"I think David felt like that little girl when he wrote the words which you have just read."

"Was David going over a bridge, mother?"

"Not such a bridge as the one in the woods; but he had come to some place of difficulty in his life, and whenever he was in any way troubled he looked up to God, just as the little girl did to her father, and said, 'Preserve me, O God!' It is the same as if he said: 'Please take care of me, my kind heavenly Father; I do not feel afraid if you take hold of my hand.'"

"O mother, how beautiful! But God did not really take hold of David's hand, and lead him through the trouble?"

"No; but God loves his children who trust in him—who feel safe in his care—just as the father did his little daughter; and though He does not take hold of their hands, He knows how to make them feel as peaceful and easy as if he did."

"Mother, can I be one of God's children?"

"Yes, my dear. If you love Him, and trust Him, and try to please Him, He will call you His own, and lead you all your life, and make you happy."

"Will there be any bridges in my life? I mean, shall I have trouble? Now I have not any, have I? I have not to look up to God, and ask Him to take care of me."

"You must not think great troubles are the only ones we have to meet with. You will have many small troubles, and will need to look to your heavenly Father to take care of you through them."

"What troubles do you think I have, mother?"

"You had one this morning. Sarah was unkind to you, and you were sadly grieved."

"Could I go to God with such troubles?"

"Yes, my dear; you can tell Him, just as you would me, all your unhappiness, and ask Him to comfort you."

"Mother, I am very glad we read that psalm this morning; I think I love God better already, and I hope I shall always trust Him."

"I hope you will; and if you begin when you are a little girl, you will learn better and better about Him, and be far happier than those who have no such friend to go to in trouble."

"Why, cannot everybody go to God with their wants?"

"Certainly, if they will; but a great many people never tell Him their troubles, never ask Him to forgive them. They did not begin in their childhood, and it is difficult to learn these trusts when we are old."

"O I hope I shall learn it now, while you can help me, mother."

"God alone can help you, my child; ask Him to teach you to trust Him." [Young Reader.]

Dressing for the Party.

Miss Ada, as the reader of the volume entitled "The Beauty of the Heart" will recollect, had stained a dress which she had intended to wear at a party, and it required a great deal of coaxing to induce her to go in another dress. I do not think it was worth while to coax her to go. She probably would have lost nothing by staying at home.

Young persons should do what they ought to do without coaxing. It is an unpleasant employment for the coaxer, and very unpleasant to the speciator. We can never respect one who requires coaxing in order to be induced to do that which is proper and right. Some persons seem to think it increases their consequence to require coaxing.

The boys in the village were to have a grand excursion for hickory-nuts. A meeting of a few of the leading boys was held, to determine who should constitute the party. One boy was not to be invited, because he was profane; another, because he was apt to be noisy and vulgar.

"Stanly should be asked," said one.

"I don't know about it," said another.

"Why not? He will be glad to go; and he is a very gentlemanly fellow."

"That is true; but he will want coaxing in order to go: he will pretend he don't want to go. I don't like such pretendings. I like to have one show his colors, and do what he means to, without any fuss about it. You may ask Stanly, if you have a mind to, and coax him too: I won't." E. F.

Boldness

Is blind; wherefore it is still in counsel, but good in execution. For in counsel, it is good to see dangers; in execution, not to see them, except they be very great.—[Bacon.

Absence

Diminishes the lesser passions and augments the greater ones, as the wind puts out the candle and fans the fire.

A short Sermon.

"We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."—ROM. 8 28:

"All things?" Yes, cares, perplexities, as well as other things.

They will help on your progress.

Do not say, "If I were an eminent saint, I might fancy this to be so." It belongs to all who "love God," i. e. who acquiesce in his will, who love the work and person of his Son, in whom the Father is revealed.

"We know" all this: we know it: it is most sure.

USE OF DIAMONDS IN THE ARTS.

Diamonds are not used exclusively as articles of ornament or luxury. They are frequently employed with great advantage in the arts. Bad, discoloured diamonds, are sold to break into powder, and are said to have more extensive sale than brilliants, with all their captivating beauty. In many operations of art they are indispensable; the fine cameo and intaglio owe their perfection to the diamond, with which alone they can be engraved. The beauty of the onyx would yet remain dormant, had not the unrivalled power of the diamond been called forth to the artist's assistance. The cornelian, the agate or cairngorm, cannot be engraved by any other substance. Every great or letter cut upon hard stone is indebted to the diamond. This is not all; for without it blocks of crystal could not be cut into slices for spectacles, agate for snuff-boxes, etc. To ascertain whether any specimen is a true diamond or not, a fine file may be used; and if the surface of the stone be the least abraded or scratched by its action, it is not a diamond. The difference will also appear upon close examination without this instrument; the rays of light easily pass through other gems, but in the diamond they are refracted to the surface, which occasions its superior brilliancy. If the specimen under examination be very minute, it may be placed between two flat metalic surfaces, and pressed with the thumb and finger; if a diamond it will not be injured, but if otherwise it will break and fall to powder.

A well known application of the diamond is in cutting glass; the pencil diamond, a small fractured piece, is employed for this purpose; it is of a trapezoidal shape, weighing about the sixteenth part of a carat, and is set in a wooden handle. Diamonds are also employed for the nibs of pens made of gold; and are found to bear constant use for many years without any appreciable wearing. From the high refractive power of the diamond, it is sometimes employed to form minute and exquisitely accurate lenses for the best kind of microscope. In respect to the general operations of the lapidary or jewel-cutter, they could hardly be conducted without the aid of diamond-dust; for the general mode of cutting and shaping precious stones is to hold them against a very small metallic disc or wheel, which is rotating with great velocity, and to moisten the edge of this disc with oil and diamond dust. The exceedingly hard particles of diamond dust enable the disc to cut the stone or jewel.

EXERCISE OUT OF DOORS.

Hon. Erastus Brooks, who has traveled extensively in Europe, and is a close observer of society, in a recent article in the New York Express, makes the following remarks upon out-door exercise:

We might look over the world in vain for another people like ours for in-door confinement, not only in our large towns and cities but in the country. As a consequence the health is impaired, and cheerfulness is a stranger to the family hearth, around which the matrons sit and sew. Not only are they self-condemned in this imprisonment, but their innocent children too are debarred from their birth-right of air and sunshine. The Germans in the old country, the French peasantry may be gay and happy, with their toil and their crust; they have frequent holidays, and between the hours of work find their way in crowds to the public gardens, where they gain health and vigor by recreation. The women spend several hours every day out of doors. But American dames, rich and poor, make their walks few and far between, and shiver over fires with a novel, or work in the house with doors and windows shut.

The robust health of the English ladies is often spoken of, and their pedestrian achievements; but what American lady would not shrink at the idea of being expected to walk six or eight miles on a stretch! They could not do it! No—they could not; because they have never been used to exercise, and half a mile exhausts their strength. So, between this habitual indolence and late hours, they lose the fresh beauty of childhood before they are out of their teens; and at forty they are victims of chronic disease.

SINGULAR TRAITS OF SONG BIRDS.

A gentleman of my acquaintance had an American mocking-bird in such health and vigor that it was constantly singing or else imitating the various sounds it heard. In order to try the powers of this bird, the owner purchased a fine sky-lark. When placed in the same room with the mocking-bird the song of the former was heard to echo through the house, as if it were chanting "on fluttering wing" its well known welcome to the rising sun. The mocking-bird was silent for some time, but at last broke forth in the strains of the "aerial songster," but louder and clearer, as if mounting and stretching its wings towards heaven. The lark was silent that moment, nor was a joyous note ever heard afterward. Willing to test the power of the mocking-bird still further, an unusual large price was given for a black-bird, celebrated for its vocal powers. It was placed in the same room with the mocking-bird. Early on the second morning its song was resumed and its charming notes were warbled forth with all the sweetness and modulation which may be heard in its native "thorny brakes." The mocking-bird listened and was silent for a time, when all at once its notes were heard to issue forth, but louder and sweeter than those of the woodland songster. The poor blackbird heard them, felt that it was conquered, remained silent, drooped, pined and died. From the above facts, emulation would seem to be one of the exciting causes of the songs of the birds. When their powers are excelled they appear to feel disgrace at being conquered and to loose all inclination to renew their former efforts.—Jesse's Country life.

HOW TO IMPROVE THE MEMORY.

What we wish to remember we should attend to, so as to understand it perfectly, fixing our attention specially on its most important and distinctive features. We should disengage our minds for the moment from other things, that we may attend effectually to that which is before us. No man will read with much advantage who cannot empty his mind at pleasure of other subjects, and does not bring to the author he reads an intellect neither troubled with care nor agitated with pleasure. If the mind be filled with other matters, how can it receive new ideas? It is a good practice to improve the memory, and far better than making notes for transcribing passages at the time, to read carefully, and after the lapse of some days to write an abstract of what has been read. This will give us the habit of storing up for future use our immediate acquisitions in knowledge. Again, memory is assisted by an orderly arrangement of the thoughts. It is obvious that in recollecting a speech or discourse, that is most easily recalled in which the argument proceeds from one step to another by regular induction. So we ought to conduct our studies; otherwise, our knowledge being in confusion, our memory will be defective. [Letter of Baron Alderson.

THE DOOM OF THE WORLD.

The North British Review, discoursing on the doom of the world, has the following remarks:

"What this change is we dare not even conjecture but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe, the whirling comets wielding their loose material at the solar surface, the volcanic eruptions in our own satellite, the appearance of new stars and the disappearance of others, are all foreshadows of that impending convulsion to which the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under heavens which are to pass away, thus residing, as it were on the cemeteries, and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation."

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO WM. J. BLOCKER.

The following Preamble and Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the third Quarterly Conference for Harrison circuit, East Texas. Conference held at Liberty Church, July 10th, 1858.

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God, in his wisdom—which to us is inscrutable—to remove from our midst our highly esteemed and beloved brother and member of this Conference, WM. J. BLOCKER, on the 13th June, 1859.

Resolved first, That in the death of Brother B. the Church has lost one of its most circumspect and exemplary members, this Conference one of her most efficient and faithful stewards, and society a useful member.

Resolved second, That we bow in meek submission to this afflicting dispensation, which teaches us the uncertainty of life; and that, while we treasure up his memory, we will follow his example, that we may be ultimately associated in heaven.

Resolved third, That the members of the Quarterly Conference deeply sympathize with his afflicted widow and children, whom we will remember at a throne of grace.

Resolved fourth, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished his bereaved family, spread upon our minutes and forwarded to the Christian Advocates, at Nashville, New Orleans and Galveston, and request their publication.

J. W. JOHNSON, Secretary.
JAMES T. P. IRVINE, P. E.

MRS. CATHERINE JOYNER, in Pickens County, Alabama, died June 10th, 1859. She professed religion several years ago, under, I believe, the ministry of Rev. S. H. Cox, on Columbus circuit—joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and remained a consistent member of the same till her death. Her meek, quiet, unobtrusive Christian spirit attached her in strong affection to the whole circle of her acquaintances. I was with her much during her illness. A few days before she died the Lord abundantly blessed her soul. She was enabled to praise God in the immediate prospect of death. Thinking she was going to die soon, she bade her friends farewell, exhorting all to meet her in heaven. Taking one of her little brothers by the hand, she requested him to be good, and to learn to love the Lord while he was young. Calling for her little babe, she took it in her trembling arms, kissed it, and gave it up to God—saying, "The Lord knows better how to take care of it than I do." She lingered on a few days, suffering intensely, and then fell asleep in Jesus. She was in the bloom and prime of life, having been married about eighteen months. Her little son, Willy, about six months old, whom she gave up to God: about three days after, it followed its mother to the heavenly world. They were not separated long, but I suppose theirs was a happy reunion in the land of rest. May this affliction of Providence be sanctified to the spiritual profit of the relations and friends left behind. G. HAWKINS.

MISS EMMA J. IVY, daughter of T. J. and M. C. Ivy, died the 11th of July, 1859, at her father's residence, Macon county, Ala., aged 14 years and 5 months. Emma was born the 30th of January, 1845, in Columbia county, Ga.; and, with her parents, moved to this State in the year 1851. During a revival of religion at Magnolia Church last year, in the month of July, Emma was happily converted to God and joined the M. E. Church, South, of which she remained a faithful and upright member until God called her to her heaven in heaven; for which she was fully prepared when the dark messenger, death, approached her. She was sorely afflicted for the long space of sixty-days, and yet, she was not heard to utter a complaint. Nothing but her unshaken confidence in God could have kept her in such perfect quietude. A few days before she was taken ill, she was in class-meeting, and when asked by her leader concerning her prospect for glory, she told him that she was on her way to heaven. This integrity she preserved through all her sufferings, and finally sank calmly in death, and her spirit flew to mansions on high. She has left a weeping father and mother, and brother and sisters. But they sorrow not as those who have no hope. A. DOWLING.

MRS. MARTHA ELIZABETH McAMIS, the daughter of E. and V. Cooper, was born in Athens, Tennessee, January 31st, 1831, and died of Dropsy near Montevallo, Shelby county, Alabama, May 31, 1859. She was converted and joined the M. E. Church at Rome, Georgia, in 1847. This is the second year she has been a pious, worthy member of my charge; during which time she has been afflicted, and more than once brought near the gate of death. Amid her sufferings her faith in God was unmoved, her confidence in his word implicit. I think afflictions did the work in her; for which God often sends them, "working" for her "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." She left a father, brothers and sisters, and many kind friends to mourn over her departure; but we weep in hope. In gone-by years her mother, sister and other dear relatives passed over to the bright land of Spirits, and only two or three months before her, her affectionate husband took his exit, and now she too has gone to join them in heaven.

FRANK BRANDON.

WILLIAM F. BYONS, son of H. and Eliza Byons, died the 4th of July, 1859, at the residence of his father-in-law, in Pike county, Ala., after a protracted illness of six months and ten days—during which time he must have suffered several deaths. He had been a member of the M. E. Church, South, a few years prior to his death. His life, at all times, was not such as strict Church members desire to see, nevertheless he became consistent. While he was suffering, his faith seemed strong and unshaken; his hope of heaven strong and clear. He conversed about death very calmly a few days before he departed. At last, the time for his release rolled up, and without a struggle, sigh or groan, he breathed his soul into the hands of God. He left a wife and one child to mourn their loss. May God be a husband to the widow and a father to the fatherless.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!
B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Chlorosis or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.
MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:
SUSSEX—A girl of 16 or 18 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The retarded sympathetic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the Intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 20, 1858.
MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was affected with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold.
Very respectfully yours, C. K. STAVENS

TRUTH UNDISPUTED.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.
Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.
Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, A. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]
Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.
DEAR VESEY! Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.
On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.
On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect my impression occasioned by a small dose was manifested, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, precisely, more was administered, but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.
On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses or a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the frightful number of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.
Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, vary ing in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the eldest,) the like happy results have been produced.
These facts are exhibited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.
W. H. VASSER.

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours. M. MCCORMICK.

We Dont Want Any Other.
Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that and any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it to be superior to all others; therefore when they are in want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had some in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to work off, but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be. WINER'S VERMIFUGE owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, and were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other articles designed for similar purposes. To all who are in want of a medicine of the kind we say try it and judge for yourselves, we are confident that it will give entire satisfaction.

Beware of Calomel.
The public generally may not be aware that nearly all Worm Lozenges contain calomel, and that the lives of children are thereby endangered; parents should remember this, for although medicine may be easily administered when in the form of Lozenges or Candies of any description, yet the danger that is incurred through the advantages, besides Calomel very often fails in accomplishing the desired object, it is by no means to be depended on as a remedy for Worms, and it is not now so generally resorted to by physicians as it was a few years ago, they have become convinced of the danger of its use and of the uncertainty with which it acts, and have prudently and wisely resorted to other means by which these objections are obviated.
Physicians generally now use WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, this medicine is a simple vegetable preparation and can always be administered with perfect safety and confidence as to the result, as it will always destroy Worms and restore the patient to health.

Save the Children.
Of the multitudes of children that die before they reach their twelfth year, three fourths are believed to be the victims of internal worms, or of diseases arising from that cause. A medicine like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which will infallibly and rapidly cure the disease, is therefore of immense importance to every family. It is extolled in the highest terms by the faculty, and at this time when the mortality among children is greater than was ever before known, it is not safe or prudent for any household to be without it. Believing that the frightful increase of deaths among children is mainly attributable to worms and the disorders they produce, we recommend this specific to all who have charge of young families.

Winer's Canadian Vermifuge.
Of all the pernicious bumbugs that ignorance ever preached, the deceiving that internal worms are not injurious, is the most cruel. They engender incurable diseases of the stomach and bowels, and are the truthful causes of Chronic Diarrhœa and Chronic Dysentery, Inflammation of the Mesentery, Epileptic Fits, Insanity, Imbecility, Consumption and Apoplexy. In fact the disease says the very fountains of vitality, and leads with absolute certainty, unless arrested in time, to an early death. Let Parents reflect on these undeniable facts, and remove the danger in time with that infallible preparation, which the faculty have pronounced a specific, WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE.

Facts for Parents.
What, in the opinion of physicians, is the most common and fatal disease of children? Ans. Worms.
What are the ordinary symptoms? Ans. A pale cadaverous complexion, dullness of the eyes, swelling of the upper lip, unpleasant breath, itching of the nose, disturbed sleep, a dry cough, fits of voracity, nausea, and general restlessness, listlessness and emaciation.
What is the surest and most certain means of relief? Ans. WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, a medicine without any mineral ingredient, mild in its operation, and guaranteed in all cases, to effect a rapid and complete cure.

Great Mortality among Children.
The papers teem with speculations upon the amazing mortality among children; but they fail to indicate the true cause, the presence of worms in the stomach and intestines. At least half the fatal diseases to which childhood is subject are attributable to worms. This was the opinion of Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper. What mother, then, would risk the consequences of this terrible disorder, when a few doses of WINER'S Canadian Vermifuge will always sweep away the vermin and the mucus in which they are imbedded, leaving the system in a healthy condition and secure against a return of the complaint?

Negro Children in the South.
The "army worm" is not more destructive to Southern crops than intestinal worms are to Southern negro children. Thousands are swept off annually by the complaint, which is not only directly fatal in many cases, but even in its milder forms is the parent of a variety of deadly diseases. Every planter, therefore, if only from motives of self-interest should keep on hand a supply of WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which inevitably destroys these disgusting creatures and the mucus in which they are generated. In fact, no family, North or South, should be without this safe, certain and speedy remedy.

Ask the Physicians.
All medical men admit that intestinal worms cause the death of thousands of children annually, and entail many terrible diseases on those whom they do not summarily destroy. No apology, therefore, is needed for introducing a preparation like WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, which

CENTENARY INSTITUTE.

The Committee appointed by the Alabama Conference to attend the Examination and Commencement of Centenary Institute, publish the following Report:

All the members of the Committee were present, and every examination and exercise was witnessed by one or all of us; and what we now publish forms the substance of our concurrent judgment. Many classes came before us, and all the privileges and opportunities requisite for the faithful discharge of our duty were offered us. The Teachers invited, and earnestly desired us, to look rigidly into their method of teaching and examining, in order that their claims to the patronage and confidence of the public might be established.

The Centenary Institute embraces three Departments, viz: a Primary School, consisting of children of both sexes. A Male High School, consisting of boys and young men—many of whom are preparing for College, And, a Female College, in which young ladies complete their Academic Course. These are conducted in separate buildings located in different parts of the town of Summerfield.

The Primary School has been under the tuition of Mrs. Mims, and Mrs. Richardson.

The Male High School under Messrs. Connerly, Moore, Hopkins and Fitts.

The Female College under Messrs. Montgomery, Richardson, Gieffer; Misses Edwards, Heard, Garrett, Bailey, and Mrs. Gieffer.

In the first, the number of students was sixty-seven; in the second, 148; in the third, 180; making in all 395 students—showing that the Institute has more prosperity and a firmer hold on the confidence of the public than it has ever had.

The Primary School furnishes the best facilities for elementary education; and the examination of the classes, conducted in the presence of one member of the committee, showed that diligence and skill and success had characterized and crowned the efforts of the teachers and children.

The Examination of the Male School and the Female College commenced June 21st, and continued five days. This was as rigid and thorough as the time and circumstances of the Faculty and Committee allowed. The numerous classes came before us, and were examined on many subjects, embraced in the departments of Natural, Moral and Mental Philosophy, Mathematics, Chemistry, Latin, Greek, French, English Languages, Evidences of Christianity and Music.

Where so many students had to be examined, and on so many studies, but little time could be appropriated to each one. Our experience and observation teach us that this is not a fair test of scholarship, and that it is prudently employed as a stimulus to excite the students to hard application, and as an exhibition of the methods used by the teachers. A large majority sustained themselves very well, and the Committee were favorably impressed with the faithfulness, diligence, and skill of the Faculty, and the application and attainments of the Students. We heard many orations from young men, and compositions from young ladies, which evinced genius, scholarship, taste and eloquence.

The interest and profit of the occasion was much augmented by Music from the young ladies and teachers, and by orations delivered by gentlemen invited there. The commencement sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Huston, of Nashville, on Sunday morning to a large congregation, whose hearts were moved by the truths earnestly enforced by the preacher. The oration before the Literary Societies of the Male High School, was delivered by Prof. P. A. Fitts, on Monday. On Tuesday we had two orations by Rev. Messrs. Baldwin and Henderson of the Alabama Conference, on the occasion of opening two new and elegant Halls, for the Literary Society of the Female College. And on Wednesday, the annual oration before these societies was delivered by S. R. Bluke, Esq., of Selma. Beside these, we had many extemporaneous addresses on various subjects and occasions.

The moral and religious state of the schools was the subject of our attention and anxious inquiry. While we cannot report every thing as being in all respects what we desire, yet we are fully persuaded that, in religious attainment and moral influence, Centenary Institute will compare favorably with any other literary institution in our country. A refreshing and powerful revival of religion prevailed in the Church in Summerfield, last April.

This was a blessing of immense value to all the schools. Nearly one hundred persons, the large majority being students, were the subjects of this gracious work. All of these, a few only being excepted, have continued to give encouraging evidence of firmness in their religious profession. The means and encouragements for religious culture are abundant here. Reading the Scriptures and prayers are daily exercises in all the Schools. Public preaching every Sabbath; Sunday-school, Class and Prayer-meetings, are in reach of all, and are highly valued by many. And we are sanguine in our hope that results such as have heretofore crowned the labors of the pious, will continue to cheer our hearts; and that men and women who have been and shall be trained in these Halls, will continue in increasing numbers to go forth, whose talents and influence will help the Church and bless the world.

The buildings and grounds of the Institute have been much improved. A new wing has been added to the College, extending its front many feet. Two elegant edifices have been erected on the right and left of the campus, which furnish tasteful and spacious Halls for the Castalian and L. M. I. Societies. The exercises in these Societies have been very improving to the young ladies, especially in exciting them to diligence in reading, arguing, and writing. Additions have been made to the Apparatus in Chemistry and Natural Philosophy. New Musical Instruments will be added.

The Boarding department will be much improved; healthful food and clean rooms will be furnished to the Boarders.

The Libraries are increasing. The community in all this region are very hopeful with respect to the steady improvement and increasing prosperity of this cherished Institution.

The Committee full sincere gratification in the conviction that Centenary Institute merits the confidence of all who are interested in Christian education, and the patronage of all who have children to be educated.

THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

The venerated scene of our Lord's passion is about a third of an acre in extent, and is surrounded by a low wall. When Mr. Catherwood was there in 1834, taking the drawings for his beautiful panorama of Jerusalem, the garden was planted with olive, almond, and fig trees. Eight of the olive trees are so large that they are said to have been in existence ever since the time of Jesus Christ, although we learn from Josephus that Titus cut down all the trees within 100 furlongs of the city. These trees are highly venerated by the members of the Roman communion there, who consider any attempt to cut or injure them an act of profanation. Should any one of them be known to pinch any of the leaves, he would incur a sentence of ex-communication.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.

REPORT OF THE VISITING COMMITTEE.

The Visiting Committees of the Louisiana and Mississippi Conferences having visited the Centenary College of Louisiana, beg leave to report: That they have, with much pleasure and gratification, witnessed the exercises in connection with the Commencement of the College.

As Visiting Committees, we have no special instructions as to our duties in the premises, but we suppose that we have been sent by our respective Conferences to note how the interests of the College are connected by the proper authorities, to whose guardian charge the interests are committed. We are pleased to report that the examinations were thorough—there had been no special preparation on special parts, merely to make a show; but, whatever the student knew of his respective studies, was seen in the examination. The examination in general was highly creditable both to the Faculty and the Students.

We can but admire the firmness of the Faculty in administering discipline. The past session gave them full trial of their powers; and we rejoice to know that their prudence and firmness have given general satisfaction.

The College buildings stand in their magnificent proportions in a delightful grove near the village of Jackson—honorable both to the State and more especially to the two patronizing Conferences. If there is anything in the general appearance of the College buildings and their surroundings, having a faculty of the highest grade in learning and of acknowledged success in educating, with the intelligence and refinement of the citizens of Jackson, certainly this is the most inviting College in the whole of the South-west where a young man may obtain a polite education; and the character of the faculty is a sure guarantee to any parent or guardian that the education of his son or ward will be thorough as well as polite.

We are glad to see that henceforth greater attention will be paid to the Natural Sciences. The Board of Trustees having elected to that Chair a gentleman of high qualifications, whose whole time will be devoted to its duties. The former incumbent of this chair resigned, because his duties as a practicing physician would not permit him to devote the necessary time to the duties of the Chair. This resignation produced general regret among the Faculty and Board of Trustees, and a resolution was passed expressing their appreciation of him as a Professor of Natural Science, and a regret that he felt it his duty to vacate the Chair.

We are sorry to say that the College is yet but very partially endowed and that there is yet a considerable debt hanging over it. Could not its friends, could not the two patronizing Conferences devise some plan by which the debt can be paid and the College endowed. Could this be done, the College would be established on such permanent basis that our children and children's children to the latest generation would reap the fruits of our labors.

It is needless for us to say that we were edified by the different able addresses delivered to the Alumni by Prof. Scales to the Litterary Societies by the Rev. Mr. Andrews of Mobile, Ala., to the Graduating Class, by Pres. Miller. All were rich in thought and beautiful in expression.

We were highly pleased, too, with the exhibitions of the different departments, from the Preparatory to the Graduate. These, of course, were not all equal, but all were interesting—all were beautiful. The bud and the bloom are alike lovely in their different perfections.

To those who send their children here, we will say, that it is as safe a place as they can find outside of the sacred enclosures of home. They may be assured that everything which is within the reach of the Professors will be done, not only to improve and refine the intellect, but also to improve and build up the moral man—to make their sons fully adequate to the high performance of life's duties in any of its various departments.

We close by recommending the College to the community at large as a very excellent and proper place, where the youth of our Country may receive a good education, in the proper acceptation of that term.

BROOKHAVEN COLLEGE FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Mr. Editor.—I avail myself of your kindness to say to the friends of female education, that we are rapidly pushing forward our new and extensive College building at Brookhaven, Lawrence county, Mississippi. And we hope, with the divine blessing, to have everything ready early this Fall to accommodate a large number of pupils.

It is already known that the erection of the College building, the superintendence of all the financial and general business operations of this enterprise, are with Rev. M. J. Whitworth. His energy, ability, and former success, warrant the public expectation that nothing will be left undone on his part to make our College in all respects worthy of public patronage.

We have secured the best talent to head each Department, and are making arrangements to secure apparatus etc., so that every advantage may be enjoyed by those who may desire an education at home.

We will send you soon, an advertisement, with names of the Faculty, terms, etc. That the people may know something of the "antecedents" as well as present character of our President, I beg leave to subjoin one of many testimonials that are at command. You are personally acquainted with the writer, who is a prominent member of the Alabama Conference, and was in circumstances to know well the things whereof he affirms: Writing from Tuskegee, Alabama, he says:

"A graduate of one of the noblest Universities of our land, while under the supervision of that model President of literary institutions, the great Stephen Olin, by an almost unremitted devotion to literary pursuits, he has added to his early attainments, a depth of erudition, which is the result of patient intellectual toil. The fact, that he has been called to positions of high official dignity in some of the first grade Institutions of the State, is prima facia evidence of his scholarship and the purity of his character. Along with his superior education and universal aptitude to impart instruction, may be mentioned his skill as a disciplinarian. The power to control, manage, direct, to cause the separate parts of the whole machinery of school organism to work together in unison and harmony is a cardinal excellence in its presiding officer.

His ability in this regard, Prof. Lee evidenced to the public satisfaction, while President of the Masonic Female College, Auburn, Alabama. And, though years have intervened since that period, yet the wisdom of his discipline and the success of his labors are still fresh in the minds of his former patrons.

His accomplished lady likewise combines all the essential qualifications which the position she is to fill requires that she should possess. Herself a pattern of female excellence, the daughters of Mississippi should esteem themselves highly favored in the enjoyment of her example and instruction."

S. ARMSTRONG,
Agent of Tuskegee Female College, Alabama.

A personal acquaintance with each member of the Faculty we have employed, and an opportunity to know their several ability—and the fact that their epistle is gone forth with those who have had the benefit of their instructions, warrants me in saying to the friends of religion and learning, that we have a corps of teachers every way worthy and well qualified. H. J. HARRIS.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

Shanghai, China, April 25, 1859.

Mr. Editor:—The last mail, which came in some ten days since, brought us very encouraging news from the Church. I was absent from home, in the country, preaching, when the mail came.

Thanks be unto God, we do hope and trust a better day is in store for China; and to see the church at home coming up to the help of the Lord is encouraging to us all in this benighted land. There is work enough in this vast empire of darkness, for thousands of missionaries. Let them come, all who can and will. Come with the love of God burning in their hearts, and with an earnest desire to win souls unto Christ. If such be the ambassadors of Christ to this people, there is no doubt of their success. If they continue faithful in their allegiance to God, their work shall be crowned with success. But the patience and forbearance one needs in teaching this people the words of eternal life! Our work is one of prayer; one of faith, and one of patience. Let them come quickly, my dear brethren; and may the prayers of all God's people be with them on the great deep and after they arrive on their field of labor.

I am happy to hear that the Mississippi Conference, with other Conferences, intend sending another Missionary to this field. Thanks be unto God for such a prospect of an increase of laborers in China. Other Missionaries are receiving more help for the extension of the work; and soon I hope to see one or more Missionaries stationed in every important city in China. Shall we be behind the Roman Catholics? They are going everywhere, and establishing themselves in large cities. God forbid that we should refuse to undergo any privations, toil and labor for the salvation of this heathen nation. Only a few days since, a Chinaman from the North came in and wanted a book. He is the Captain of a boat and says that many Catholic Missionaries went up to Caria and to the Northern provinces of China last year, on his and other boats. O, that God would stir us up to a sense of our duty. I know that we have truth on our side, and we have Missionaries who are willing to undergo any hardship that God may be glorified, and that the way may be prepared for the Kingdom of Christ. Let us have funds that the work may be extended, and let not the Missionaries be cramped for funds.

I hope, from time to time, our number of laborers on the field will be re-inforced. And, if it is possible, let us have a superintendent; and every year let us have a visit from the Bishop by way of Californ.

Our Bro. Liew has never been ordained, and we have other young men now in the Church whom we hope ere long will be taken with us in the vineyard of the Lord. I trust the different Conferences will send out the aid promised forthwith. Send men under thirty if it is possible, for it is under that age they are better able to acquire a knowledge of this difficult language. The younger the better.

I have a little Chinese boy whom I called C. K. Marshall. I intend sending him to Centenary College, Louisiana, by the first opportunity; I have the promise of another, and I wish to call his name John R. Lambuth, unless the Conference wish to change their names. I send these boys on my own responsibility, and have paid out my own money for them, that is for their support while here; so that I hope no one will complain of what I have done. I am also making a collection of various specimens of nature and art for the College cabinet, at President Miller's request. I am also preparing a box of the same kind, for Madison College, in the Mississippi Conference. I hope to send them some time during this year, if I am successful in making a good selection.

Let the Church do all they can for us, and we shall be encouraged. But if there be indifference in regard to the work, it casts a damper upon our feelings and we are unfitted for our duty. Let all remember us in prayer, daily prayer at a throne of grace, and may God grant his blessing. J. W. LAMBUTH.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, FLORENCE, ALA.

Uniform prosperity has attended this Institution since its location in Florence.

At the recent Examination and Commencement, its merited fame for thorough instruction was not only sustained but greatly augmented. The large audience seemed entertained and highly delighted. The pupils of the Preparatory Department, together with the four Collegiate Classes, gave to the Examining Committee unmistakable evidence of their thorough knowledge of the studies pursued.

During the past year the patronage has been larger than at any former period of its history. The health of the students has been uniformly good, and their moral deportment worthy of the highest commendation. For intelligence, morality and religion, Florence has but few equals among our Southern towns.

The Trustees and Faculty are much indebted to the citizens of this pleasant place for the refined, moral and religious influences, exerted over the young gentlemen of the University. It is no longer a reproach to be a College student—the best society is accessible to them all during their leisure hours, where admission is merited by a dignified and moral department. Young men are thus induced to seek recreation in the refined social circle rather than in haunts of vice and dissipation.

Through the efforts of the learned and indefatigable President, assisted by an able Faculty and an efficient Board of Trustees, this Institution has been placed upon a permanent basis; and, with a little further aid, its future prosperity will be secured almost beyond contingency.

With but little assistance from abroad, splendid buildings have been erected—suitable libraries and apparatus provided; and forty thousand dollars endowment has been secured. Two chairs have been endowed with ten thousand dollars each, one by Mr. G. W. Foster of Florence, the other by Wm. Dixon, Esq., of Franklin county, Alabama. Sixty thousand dollars more is asked and is greatly needed. May we not expect a cheerful response to this reasonable call, from the patronizing Conferences? Here is a fruitful field for usefulness, where your means deposited will continue to bless our country, the Church, and the world, when you shall have gone to your reward. Give this small amount and you will then have a permanent and noble University, located in a genial clime, in the midst of a refined and moral community, for the education of the Sons of the South.

The successful and worthy President, Rev. R. H. Rivers, D.D., together with the honored members of the former Faculty—Professors Rice, De Soto, and Briggs—will continue their relation to the University. Professors Temple and Ratcliff have been added to the Faculty. The Preparatory Department is under the supervision of Professor Rice, assisted by Mr. William H. Forbes.

With a Faculty so eminently qualified, a location so desirable, and a patronage so flattering, we confidently predict for this Institution a long and brilliant career of usefulness.

The next session will open Wednesday, 14th of September next.—One of the examining committee.

"AMERICAN SEAMEN'S FRIEND ASSOCIATION."

Mr. Editor: Under the above title, I am informed that an organization has been gotten up somewhere in the North, which purports to be a union of several evangelical denominations in the formation of a mission to sailors.

A Southern branch of which, extant somewhere in Alabama, has employed Rev. Mr. Law, a Baptist minister, as missionary to the sailors in Mobile Bay.

Mr. Law is to preach seven months of the year—the time during which sailors are there—and the remaining five to be employed as an Agent to travel through the State and solicit pecuniary aid for the Society or "Association," from all denominations, both by private and public contributions. He informs me that he has been cordially received and patronised by Methodist pastors and congregations, both at Montgomery and Selma; and that Rev. J. Barker was a warm friend of the enterprise, and farther, that the writer was the only Methodist preacher, with whom he had met, unfriendly to his Agency.

In vindication of my course, I may be allowed to give my reasons; which, although they may not be satisfactory to Mr. Law or the friends of the "Association," I have no doubt of exculpating myself in the judgment of the Alabama Conference.

I have not favored the Agent of this association; first, because of its inutility. There can be no necessity for a union society to do the legitimate work of the Church. This, in its different forms of organization, has, within itself, every element necessary to the entire civilization of the world.

If this is really Missionary ground, and a Missionary or more can be employed with any prospect of success, the Methodists have the right sort of men, and means from our Missionary treasury to send them. The same may be said of the Baptists and Presbyterians in Alabama.

But to talk of a union of the different denominations as necessary to send a single Missionary to a few sailors in Mobile Bay, is to my mind supremely ridiculous.

Besides, it is totally impracticable. The idea of a union Missionary enterprise, of Baptists and Methodists, is the wildest chimera, and equally absurd with Horace's figure of yoking doves and tigers.

After having endorsed the "Iron Wheel," that foul slander upon Methodism—and many of their ministers industriously circulated it—and, especially, since the action of their late Convention at Richmond, Virginia, in which they refuse all fraternization with others, and their "old land-mark" which closes the doors of their pulpits against us—it seems to me that consistency on their part, and self-respect on ours, would forever preclude the possibility of a union enterprise of this sort.

And, moreover, it appears that Mr. Law is the only Missionary to sailors in Alabama, employed by this association. He is therefore nearly half his time lecturing and lifting collections from the wealthy congregations of all denominations, to support himself the other half. If he has the usual success of other Agents in Alabama engaged in laudable undertakings, I should think him handsomely supported; and he certainly does not collect funds to send elsewhere.

But to conclude, I am unwilling to tax my congregation to send a Baptist preacher as Missionary anywhere. We support our own missions and no other. If the Baptist Church in Alabama approves of this mission they are abundantly able to support Mr. Law, and I have no doubt will do it independently of foreign aid.

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITH IT?

To the Brethren of the Mississippi Conference:

Dear Brethren: At your last session, you adopted a resolution with great animation and emphasis, agreeing to raise at least $5 each for the relief of the Washington city enterprise. The money was to be sent to the Depository at Vicksburg. Up to this date, not more than thirty dollars have been received. Probably some has been handed over to the Presiding Elders or others, and will soon be heard from.

Let me beg you not to allow that resolution to fall into a fatal sleep.

If there is an enterprize on the Continent needing and deserving the assistance of noble and generous Christians, it is Smithson's church-building enterprise.

Washington City is, in one respect, like Cooper's Well. It has its season of gathering and swollen crowds, and its season of abandonment, vacancy, and almost solitude.

If ten thousand persons visited Cooper's Well for three or four months every year, it would be worth while for the Church of the State to aid in erecting a Methodist Church on the grounds.

It would not be reasonable to suppose that the few members residing there or contiguous could afford to build one large enough for the occasional gathering. And it is obvious that everybody in the Church, throughout the State, would be interested in having such a church at such a place; always, provided there was no suitable accommodation for them otherwise.

Now, this is the case at Washington City. The local and fixed population of the city is feeble, with little means, and, like a watering place, annually relying on visitors from abroad to keep things alive around them.

Other denominations have built churches there, by the aid of their friends abroad. They are before us. Will we consent that our people, in visiting the Federal City on business or otherwise, shall be driven for want of room or an acceptable church, to swell the congregations of others—and thus discourage our own people? Answer this. C. K. MARSHALL.

Vicksburg, July, 1859.

GEORGE III. AND METHODISM.

Charles Wesley left three children—two of whom were members of the Methodist Church, and died at an advanced age in 1834 and '37. One of them, Charles, seems to have been a favorite with King George III., whose fine musical ear was entertained by the young man. After the old King had lost his sight, young Charles was one day with his Majesty alone, when the monarch said: "Mr. Wesley, is there anybody in the room but you and me?" "No, your Majesty," was the reply. The King then said: "It is my judgment, Mr. Wesley, that your uncle and your father, and George Whitefield, and Lady Huntington, have done more to promote true religion in the country than all the dignified clergy put together, who are so apt to despise their labors."

PROTESTANTISM IN SARDINIA.

However much the influence of the Roman Catholic Church in Piedmont may be on the decline—and it has of late years undoubtedly lost much of its hold on the affections of a large portion of the community—still Protestantism has as yet made no corresponding advance. Efforts have been made and are making by the Waldenses and others, to preach the gospel, and many Churches, such as the one at Turin, have been raised in the large towns; but the expected success has not been met with. Indeed, it has been calculated that beyond the limits of the Vaudois valley, there are not a thousand Protestants in the rest of Piedmont. Proselytism from the State Church is nominally, indeed, a legal offence, but there is no disposition on the part of the Government to throw any obstacle in the way of religious liberty. The feeling against the Church is rather against it as a polity than a religion; a struggle, in fact, for religious and civil liberty, in opposition to the enthralments of the Papacy, and a priesthood, who, by their tyranny over body as well as soul, had drawn on them the intense hatred of all classes, which had its results in the revolution of 1848. The reforms which followed on that crisis, the abolition of the ecclesiastical courts, in which the priests had the power of inflicting summary punishment, even to death itself, on those who came under their censure—a power as grievous in itself as it was unscrupulously exercised—the expulsion of the Jesuits—the more recent laws for the suppression of all convents, not having educational or charitable functions, and the regulation of the vast revenues of the Church—together with the promotion of national education, though they have as yet far from satisfied the liberal party, still cannot but be regarded as sure and certain steps toward a better and more enlightened state of things.

The Waldenses are allowed to circulate the Scriptures and religious publications in their native language, provided they confine them to those of their own sect; but this also is a merely nominal restriction, of the infraction of which the Government takes no notice; and we were rejoiced to see the Bible—a few years ago, a prohibited book, as it still is in the rest of Italy—exposed for sale in every little town. But, though it is extensively circulated and eagerly read, I am obliged to admit that, as far as my own observations go among the classes with whom I had opportunities of conversing, it is used more as a text-book against the priests, to convict them of misrepresentation from their own avowed source of truth, than from any earnest regard for the great doctrines of the gospel.

I met many instances where the Scriptures were very cleverly and logically quoted, in triumphant refutation of the dogmas of the priests, without the slightest belief in them beyond their use for the occasion. A remarkable instance of this was the conductor of the diligence to Turin, who would have gone much further in his arguments than mere skepticism, had I given him any encouragement. It is sad to feel the conviction that truth has so long been mixed with error, that when implicit faith is once fairly shaken, both must share the same fate of discredit for a time. When or how the light of truth shall be clearly enough seen, through the mists of superstition on the one hand, and materialism, utter want of faith, and distrust of all doctrine on the other—so as to be the guiding star of a newly enlightened nation, as Sardinia is proving herself to be—is a question of deep interest.—S. W. Kirk's Pennine Alps.

JAMES WATT IN HIS LAST YEAR.

Towards the close of his life Watt was distressed by the apprehension that his mental faculties were deserting him, and remarked to Dr. Darwin: "Of all the evils of age, the loss of the few mental faculties one possessed in youth is the most grievous." To test his memory, he again commenced the study of German, which he had allowed himself to forget; and speedily acquired such proficiency as to enable him to read the language with comparative ease. But he gave a stronger evidence of the integrity of his powers. When in his seventy-fifth year, he was consulted by a company at Glasgow as to the mode of conveying water from a peninsula across the Clyde to the company's engines at Dalmarnock—a difficulty which appeared to them almost insurmountable—the plan suggested by Watt proved that his remarkable ingenuity remained unimpaired by age. It was necessary to fit the pipes through which the water passed to the uneven and shifting bed of the river, and Watt, taking the tail of the lobster for his model, forwarded a plan of a tube of iron similarly articulated, which was executed and laid down with complete success.

A few years later, when close upon his eightieth year, the aged mechanician formed one of a party assembled in Edinburgh, at which Sir Walter Scott was present. He delighted the northern literati with his kindly cheerfulness, not less than he astonished them by the extent and profundity of his information—"The alert, kind, benevolent old man," says Scott, "had his attention alive to every one's question—his information at every one's command. His talents and fancy overflowed on every subject. One gentleman was a deep philologist, he talked with him on the origin of the alphabet, as if he had been coeval with Cadmus; another, a celebrated critic—you would have said the old man had studied political economy and belles lettres all his life; of science it is unnecessary to speak—it was his own distinguished walk." The vast extent of his knowledge was remarked by all who came in contact with him. "It seemed," said Jeffry, "as if every subject that was casually started, had been that which he had been occupied in studying." Yet, though no man was more ready to communicate knowledge, none could be less ambitious of displaying it.

"He was," says Mrs. Shimmel Pennick, "in the vivid portrait she has drawn of him in her autobiography, "one of the most complete specimens of the melancholic temperament. His head was generally bent forward or leaning on his hand in meditation, his shoulders stooping and his chest falling in, his limbs lank and unmuscular, and his complexion sallow. His utterance was slow and unimpassioned, deep and low in tone, with a broad Scottish accent; his manner gentle, modest and unassuming. In a company where he was not known, unless spoken to, he might have tranquilly passed the whole time in pursuing his own meditations. When he entered a room, men of letters, men of science, nay, military men, artists, ladies, even little children thronged around him. I remember a celebrated Swedish artist having been instructed by him that rats' whiskers make the most pliant paint-brushes; ladies would appeal to him on the best means of devising grates, curing smoking chimneys, warming their houses, and obtaining fast colors. I can speak from experience of his teaching me how to make a dulcimer and improve a Jew's harp." What Jeffrey said of the steam-engine may be applied to the conversation of his parent—that like the trunk of an elephant it could pick up a pin or rend an oak. [Quarterly Review.

STATISTICS OF SUICIDE.

A work on suicide, recently published by a Frenchman, M. Lisle, states that in France, from 1836 to 1852, inclusive, there were fifty-two thousand one hundred and twenty-six suicides, or a mean of three thousand and sixty-six a year. Before 1836 the proportion was one suicide to every seventeen thousand six hundred and ninety-three inhabitants. In 1836 it was one for fourteen thousand two hundred and seven; and in 1852 it had risen to one for nine thousand three hundred and forty. In 1838 and 1839 England had one suicide for every fifteen thousand nine hundred inhabitants; France one for every twelve thousand four hundred and eighty-nine. Between London and Paris, for the same years, the difference is yet more remarkable, the figures being for London one in eight thousand two hundred and fifty, and for Paris one in two thousand two hundred and twenty one. The North of France is the most prolific in suicides; nearly half of the whole number belongs to the north, which has increased its own ratio by one-third. The North has one in six thousand four hundred and eighty-three; the East one in thirteen thousand eight hundred and fifty-five; the South one in twenty thousand four hundred and fifty-seven. The department of the Seine, which includes Paris, has risen with frightful rapidity; but Paris and Marseilles, and all large centres, are the foci of suicides to a very striking extent.

Russia stands the lowest of European States in the scale—her suicides being only one in forty-nine thousand one hundred and eighty-two; while Prussia has one in fourteen thousand four hundred and four; Austria one in twenty thousand nine hundred; New York one in seven thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven; Boston one in twelve thousand five hundred; Baltimore one in thirteen thousand six hundred and fifty; and Philadelphia one in eleven thousand eight hundred and seventy-three. The author maintains that suicide is not always a sign of mental alienation, but, like every other human movement, obeys fixed laws, and that hence, year by year, it can be confidently predicted how many out of a certain population will commit suicide. The opinion is expressed that climate has little to do with the matter, and the author says that in latitude from forty-two degrees to fifty-four degrees the proportion is one in thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-two; from fifty-four degrees to sixty-four degrees, one in fifty-six thousand five hundred and seventy-seven. Yet the last figures include Moscow and St. Petersburg, and represent a much more rigorous, damp, uncertain, and joyless climate than the first. [Balt. American.

SCOTLAND'S MAIDEN MARTYR.

In no words that so beautifully and tenderly set forth the tender sympathy which Christ, as their Head, cherishes for his beloved people, I could venture to add any that ever fell from mortal lips, I would select those of Margaret Wilson, Scotland's Maiden Martyr.

Some two hundred years ago, there was a dark period of suffering in this land, when deeds of bloody cruelty were committed on God's people, not outdone by Indian butcheries. One day the tide is flowing in the Solway Frith, rushing like a race horse, with snowy mane, to the shore. It is occupied by groups of weeping spectators. They keep their eyes fixed on two objects out upon the wet sands. There, two women, each tied fast by their arms and limbs to a stake, stood within the sea mark; and many an earnest prayer is going up to heaven, that Christ, who bends from the throne to the sight, would help them now in their hour of need. The elder of the two is staked farthest out. Margaret, the young martyr, stands bound, a fair sacrifice, near by the shore. Well, on the big billows come, hissing to their naked feet; on, and further on they come, death riding on the top of the waves, and eyed by those tender women with unflinching courage. The waters rise and rise, till, amid a scream and cry of horror from the shore, the lessening form of her that had death first to face, is lost in the foam of the surging wave. It recedes, but only to return; and now, the sufferer gasping for breath, the death struggle is begun; and now, for Margaret's trial and her noble answer. "What see you yonder?" said their murderers, as, while the water rose cold on her own limbs, they pointed her attention to her fellow confessor, in the suffocating agonies of a protracted death. Response, full of the boldest faith and brightest hope, and all the divine unfathomed consolation of any text to you, she firmly answered, "I see Christ suffering in one of his own members." Brave and glorious words I borrowed in that hour from the precious language of my text, and leading us to the apostle's most comforting and sublime conclusion, "We have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." Dr. GUTHRIE.

A MEMENTO OF JOHN WESLEY.

An interesting memento of John Wesley, says the No. Ca. Advocate, was presented to the Trustees of Trinity College two weeks ago. It consists of a telescope and an electrical machine which were once the property of Wesley. Their history is briefly this. A Mr. Draper, in England, was a personal friend and relative of John Wesley, and procured these instruments from him not long before his death. He gave them to his son, who came to America, and is known to the whole country as Professor Draper, a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, and great scientific attainment. When Prof. Draper resigned his chair in Hampden Sidney College several years ago, for the purpose of accepting a professorship in the University of New York, which he continues to hold with honor, he disposed of a set of aparatus to Samuel L. Venable, Esq., who has for years been principal of the Oxford Female Academy. The statements of Prof. Draper to Mr. Venable, and to others, place it beyond question that these instruments were once the property of Wesley. Aided by several friends, we purchased these mementoes of the great and good Wesley, and they have been presented to Trinity College, to be preserved as interesting relics of the founder of Methodism. The telescope is not large, but is in good order, and is an excellent instrument for its size; the electric machine derives its only interest from its associations, and both will be admitted to have a value in the estimation of Methodists of North Carolina, far beyond their commercial or scientific worth.

GREAT BATTLES.

The battle of Solferino is truly called "the great battle," even of the century. The forces engaged on both sides could not have been less than 250,000—and were probably nearer 300,000. Compared with such a mass of combatants some of the most important battles of the century appear like skirmishes, in point of numbers. Thus, at the famous battle of Marengo, the French force was 32,000, and the Austrian 40,000. At Austerlitz, the French numbered 70,000, while the Russians and Austrians had 90,000—all, together, being but ten thousand more than the Austrian strength alone at Solferino. Wagram comes nearer in the magnitude of forces engaged, having reckoned 130,000 French and somewhat over 100,000 Austrians. At Waterloo there were 75,000 French, and 110,000 allied opponents. Not more than 15,000, on both sides, were in the battle of New Orleans. At Buena Vista, Gen. Taylor, with 4000 Americans, routed Santa Anna's 19,000 Mexicans. At Inkerman, in the Crimea, the allied French and English numbered 13,000, and [illegible] 46,000.

Where there is the most love to God, there will be the truest and most enlarged philanthropy.—Southey.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should commence at the same time.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Many persons, having been sent out before this arrangement was known, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the dates of all subscriptions conform to this rule.

We hope our friends will take notice, and help us in this desirable object. It is an accommodation to the publishers, without the slightest inconvenience to subscribers, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

VISIT TO LAGRANGE, GEORGIA.

Having accepted the courteous invitation to preach the Sermon before the Commencement of the La-Grange Female College, on Sunday, July 3d. I left [illegible] June 27th. With the exception that [illegible] pocket picked at the Pontchartrain Railroad Depot, of all the "loose change," amounting to about twenty dollars, nothing, worthy of remark varied the routine of the usually always pleasant lake-travel between this city and Mobile. Visited the brethren [illegible] Perdue, and found the latter handsomely [illegible]

Since my visit, John F. Early, Esq., has taken charge, and [illegible] continues, we are informed, to prosper. [illegible] and Neely, the Conference Agents, have been [illegible] in getting subscribed about $60,000 [illegible] Department, and for the endowment of the Publishing [illegible] as we predicted in our letter from the last session of the Alabama Conference, the $100,000 will be raised. Success to them, say we, though some of our friends over there think us "cold to the enterprise," and "neither would they be persuaded (otherwise) though one rose from the dead." We have written more in its favor than in favor of any other enterprise in which [illegible] columns conclusively show. Those [illegible] nothing but friendship in this quarter. [illegible] to contract, and sin against themselves no [illegible]

The Alabama river steamer on which we took passage [illegible], the La Grange, Capt. Cloudis, being a very popular boat, and the beginning of July being the height of the season for summer-travel Northward, was crowded beyond measure. We had from seventy-five to one hundred ladies all the way, with gentlemen, children and servants in proportion. I frequently counted [illegible] seated at the table at once. [illegible] the knavery, rampant throughout [illegible] will not allow Southern ladies with safety, [illegible] servants with them on their Northern [illegible] servants are poor substitutes. God [illegible] They are the finest servants in the [illegible] their normal condition. They are happ[illegible] than any where else. It is their [illegible] They feel honored in waiting [illegible] you feel no awkwardness in receiving [illegible] They live in the best society, have no [illegible] to give them a half dollar as a reward, [illegible] With white servants, it is not [illegible] and no Southern gentleman or [illegible] in the relation of master or mistress to [illegible] ought to be banished from American [illegible], as blots upon our civilization—free negroes and white servants. You degrade the white when you enslave him, you degrade the black when you free him. I would just about as soon disinherit a child as to free a servant. And I would nearly as soon do either as to have a white servant.

We reached LaGrange in due time. The congregation on Sunday morning was very large, filling the spacious and beautiful College chapel to overflowing. Such a [illegible] of distinguished men—ministers of different [illegible] denominations, Doctors of Divinity, Congressmen, and Judges and Lawyers and Professors—as were seated upon the platform, is hard to get together outside of Georgia. Georgia abounds in distinguished men of all classes, and in convenient railroads to bring them together. Though a native Georgian, it was the first time I have had the pleasure of preaching to a Georgia audience of any particular note. A Georgian could not help feeling at home before that vast sea of Georgia faces. That face is known wherever seen by one accustomed to it. The theme of the discourse was "An Inspired Life," from the text, "But there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." [illegible]

The Commencement, upon the whole, was one of the most interesting I have ever witnessed. They do these things on a grand scale at LaGrange. The musical [illegible], under Bro. Briggs, were magnificent. He is a master of his art. All instruments, from an organ to an anvil, were employed. The Annual Address, by Rev. [illegible] J. Bassett, D.D. on "Marriage," was as fine an [illegible] of the combination of power of thought and [illegible] eloquence as I have witnessed. It was pronounced by many, the ablest paper the Doctor has ever [illegible]. Col. Lochrane, of Macon, delivered the address to the Societies, which abounded in beauty, taste, [illegible]. And Dr. Means was there! What a [illegible]-hero he is! He delivered an address at the Sunday-School Celebration on Sunday, and a sort of [illegible] of July and College Address on Monday—both [illegible] happy vein. The Baccalaureate of President Harris was touchingly beautiful and eloquent. A large class of [illegible] young ladies graduated, who [illegible] themselves well. They have there also a [illegible] Graduate class, in which graduates of this, or [illegible], pursue an enlarged course of study for an additional year—a most admirable arrangement. The [illegible], upon the whole, is an honor to Georgia and the South, aye, and to the Church. The religion of the [illegible] Jesus reigns supreme in that College. The Presidency [illegible] for eternity as well as for time—and keeps in view the highest ends and interests of both.

I cannot close without mentioning the hearty hospitality of the citizens. The present writer and his better half were never entertained in more princely style, than in the palatial and elegant family of C. D. Pullen, Esq. [illegible] is a delightful place—the abode of wealth, [illegible] and Georgia is most honorably represented by able statesmen on the Alabama frontiers. The guest of the writer was the son of Hon. B. H. Hill, brother of our [illegible] Wm. Finney Hill, of Texas, of whom Georgia, Alabama, and the public at large, say a great many kind and flattering things. He delivered an eloquent address to the Resident Graduate class. We left [illegible] to go back again.

MINISTERIAL EXPLOIT.

Would the ministerial reader prepare a sermon, or some [illegible] for print, to be decidedly beyond [illegible] has yet accomplished—something to tell with [illegible] instrumental power: something that in glorious [illegible] other time from a two mile course of one of Na[illegible] [illegible] balls, shall, under the blessing and [illegible], run along down the days, [illegible] time. There is a way to do this!

It is to combine all the available help from God, with [illegible] the practical training of your instrumental powers.

And, in order to this, your good sense will acknowledge the secret of sufficiently early retirement at night to secure early morning-time—while time is yet a blank; while the stomach is empty, and yet not exhaustingly so; while the brain is yet a blank; while the hum of the household and of the street is either uncommenced, or, easily evaded by abstraction—then fasten the knees to the floor, then fasten the pen in the hand, then fasten the eye of the soul on God and on the Bible and on human nature, and on heaven and hell and eternity; pray—study—pray some in an agony; study some with fiery intenseness—and you will get a sight through and through some topic of thought—some pulpit or public print subject, which will overmatch the machinations of devils—and startle men, women and children into salvation. If we do not try this course, may we not be condemned, under the passage, "To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin?"

THE STUDY OF POETRY IN FEMALE COLLEGES.

No thoughtful man needs any argument to convince him, that God has given beauty a great work to perform in the improvement of the human mind. There is nothing in the arrangements of the Universe more striking than the provision for beauty, and the ordination of those laws by which its influence is adapted to impress our sensibilities. Beauty is just as much a fact as science or religion. It has its own select sphere, its particular and exclusive range in the economy of nature; and, within its scope, it may be the medium of spiritual agencies and may execute its office in representing God and ennobling our manhood. The innumerable forms in which beauty reveals itself in creation—the wonderful variety, constancy, and impressiveness of its manifestations—the serene dignity with which it asserts its superiority to mere utility, and its close affinity with those sentiments that constitute morality and religion, are all so many proofs, clear and incontestable, that God designed it to act powerfully on the heart and to make man a better and happier being—than he could be in its absence.

If the frame-work of the universe left us in any doubt as to the ministry that God had assigned to beauty, such a doubt would soon be dissipated by turning to His written word. In the Scriptures, we see God's estimate of natural beauty. Here, the highest truths of revealed religion are associated with the forms and aspects of outward nature. Here, the landscape lends its loveliness and the firmament its splendors to adorn the wisdom of the gospel. Here, the magnificent ritual of Judaism vindicates its connection with the glory of the earth and the heavens through the poetic images of Moses, David, Solomn and Isaiah; and here, Christianity, perfecting the display of the Divine character, identifies itself by the lips of Jesus with the grass, the flowers, the vines and fruits, the birds of the air and the beasts of the field. And one may conceive that Christianity might have occupied its own ground as a revelation of simple truth. But such a Christianity it has not pleased God to give to the world. No! It is a religion that speaks in parables, in most expressive images drawn from the familiar scenes of nature, in those tones that are heard amid the sublime works of the creative hand. And, in this respect, Christ was our example—an intellectual and moral example. No one ever loved the communion of nature as he loved it; no one ever used its facts and appearances as he did; and hence, it is our duty to go with him to the flowers and fields, to walk beside him as he imparts the long-hidden meaning of those mysterious symbols, to love nature not only as his original work but in that nobler office, which he had assigned to it, viz: the representative of his mediatorial love.

On this foundation, we take our stand. Beauty is not a mere pageant. It is not an idle show. It does not exist to charm the senses and to cultivate the imagination. Deeper than all this lies the truth—God's own truth—that beauty adorns the Universe to open our hearts to the communion of the Infinite Blessedness, to make known to us certain aspects of the Divine character not else communicable, and affect our feelings as they never could have been affected, had its attractions been denied an enthronement amid the wonders of the universe. If we suppose the element of beauty banished from the works of God, there might remain without doubt the exhibition of wisdom, power, majesty—but of what avail would they be to act on the senses and the mind? Whatever offices might be fulfilled by such a system, certain it is, that it could never cultivate a being like man. It would be no appeal to his senses. It would leave his heart to wither and die. And hence, the final and perfected impression of God's attributes, whatever may be their distinct modes of display, reached us in the aspects of the beauty of nature. Viewed in this light, beauty occupies in the economy of the universe a position somewhat like love in the gospel. It is the glory of God consummated; and therefore, the influence of beauty on the intellect, if rightly exorted, corresponds in a degree to the moral effect of Divine love on the affections. Agreeably to this fact, no selfish use of beauty answers its end. It is not enough that it should delight the eye and the sensuous nature. It is not enough that it transfer images of exquisite loveliness from the outer world to the inner. All this may only be self-culture and certainly self-culture is not necessarily Divine culture. One step further must be taken ere the genuine ministry of beauty is felt, which consists in the experience of its offices as interpreting God's mind by means of visible symbols, in realizing His presence in all natural forms, and in yielding the heart to those impressions, that material objects are calculated to produce.

Poetry seeks as its chief end, the representation of the beautiful, and thereby elevates and ennobles us. It stands as an intellectual mediator between the outward universe and the mind, presenting its facts and aspects, its relations and ends in such striking and engaging attractions as to excite the imagination and the feelings. It has a specific view of truth to offer—a view no more within the compass of the scientific intellect than the physical senses—a view reserved for its own discovery and exhibition. In consequence of this, poetry is essential to all deep and thorough knowledge. Apart from that fact, poetry is equally necessary to develop our faculties. A mind destitute of this taste has no claims to the merits of a noble and cultivated intellect, for one of its main organs of communion with nature is wanting, one of its spiritual senses is dead, and, to the extent of its value, the inward life is marred and deformed.

We think that poetry is admirably adapted to the culture of womanly intellect. Taught in a proper manner, at the proper time, it renders an invaluable service to the growth of the faculties, disciplining and refining them in a way and to an extent, that entitle it to the special consideration of such as are engaged in the offices of female education. But to effect this end, poetry must be a study, a profound and earnest study. The idea of deriving any important advantage from it as a mere reading exercise is ridiculous, for we might as well expect profit from reading mathematics. Nor should we look for much benefit in the use of poetry as a simple parsing exercise. Parsing contemplates chiefly the relations words sustain to each other, and as generally taught, it is little else than a play of mechanical ingenuity. No one would undertake to form an architect by instructing him in the connections of one piece of timber with another in a building; and just so, a knowledge of the artificial arrangement of words in the construction of sentences falls far short of a comprehensive study of language. The value of poetry as a branch of learning, consists in its peculiar excellence as an expressional form of mind and in these habits and tastes which are exercised, with perception and assimilation of its truths and beauties. Poetry, if worthy of attention, is no pastime, no luxurious entertainment. It speakes the highest and purest wisdom. It transcends the limits of the common, the palpable, the familiar and lifting us out of the range of every-day scenes, opens to view those sublime realities, which are permanent and eternal. Poetry penetrates our consciousness and gives utterance to sentiments and feelings that had else been voiceless. How much is dumb without, how much is dumb within, until poetry expresses the hidden import! In the production of great poems, the greatest minds have been taxed to the utmost, and the world is agreed, that the human intellect has never surpassed, in any department of thought, the magnificent works of Homer, Shakespeare and Milton. The power of appreciation is certainly very different from the power of creation. But nevertheless to appreciate the best things is one step towards improvement, and the mind is never surer of a foundation for progress than when it learns to see vast objects in the light through which they have appeared to others. Poetry takes us to those fountains that have refreshed and invigorated the deepest and most spiritual thinkers of past ages and thus it strengthens and exalts our sentiments. Then, too, poetry is much more than an embodiment of intellect. The whole mind is revealed. We do not have reason as reason, nor imagination as imagination. We do not have argument, logic, passion as such, but the entire nature is fused together and the spiritual force of one's being is brought forth in the intensest form of activity. Now, we all know that one nature will sympathize with another nature much more quickly and thoroughly than one intellect will respond to another intellect. Reason acting on reason is one thing; soul communicating to soul is quite another thing. Poetry, therefore, has this advantage over all other modes of mental action, viz: it is the whole sentient, emotional, spiritual nature operating on another nature, and hence, its peculiar excellence in education.

Take an illustration. Every teacher knows the importance of enlisting the feelings of a pupil in behalf of a study. If it is a mere intellectual business, he expects small results; but stir the heart, let it send up a living warmth and energy into the cold brain, and forthwith the pupil finds a sudden enhancement of the powers of reflection and comprehension. The auxiliary service, the sensibilities render to the intellect, is really beyond computation. Instances of dullness, of absolute incompetency to succeed in certain studies are often nothing more than cases of unawakened sensibility. Power of mind is not wanting. Power of action is only wanting. Arouse the feelings and the dormant faculties are instantly quickened into new, and frequently into wondrous life. Now, the tendency of poetry, if profoundly studied, is to stimulate the emotional nature and to enlist it in aid of the intellect. It is better adapted than any thing else to do this work. And this is emphatically true in Female education. A woman owes much of her intellectual force to sensibility. Her intellect is intimately connected with her emotional constitution—much more so than man's intellect—and hence, her talents are more nearly allied with her character than we find in the other sex. Every skilful teacher of woman will avail himself of this law, for it is a natural and beautiful provision to furnish him assistance in his great and arduous office. And there is no way, in which he can use it to wiser purpose than in poetry.

But let us not forget, that this must be made a study. It is intellectual trifling to take such a book as Paradise Lost and use it as it is often used in Female Seminaries and Colleges. Pupils must be set to it as a most laborious and energetic task, and be given to understand that it is to be a severe discipline to their faculties. Assuming that young ladies have been properly taught a fundamental knowledge of language, and that they are conversant with the general principals of Rhetoric and criticism, the poetry of Cowper, Thompson and Milton may be most advantageously employed at an advanced stage of their culture. But, as far as practicable, the methods adopted in the study of the ancient classical poetry in our best Universities for young men ought to be used. Not only should the laws of English versification be thoroughly investigated, not only should the perceptive and critical faculties be called into most vigorous exercise, but the processes of poetic thought, its associations, images and illustrations, and the relation of these processes to intellectual, moral and æsthetic philosophy ought to be rigidly analyzed. The identity of all art might likewise come under review, and those great principles by which art performs its office in the presentation of truth and the cultivation of ideality, might be satisfactorily studied. We feel confident, that any teacher of talent and elegant scholarship, if he has the enthusiasm for the grand masters of English poetry that he ought to have, will find the works above named invaluable in the office education. The results, if he has never devoted himself to this branch of instruction will surprise him, and he will see his pupils, not growing merely in refined taste and acquiring quick sensibility to the beauties of poetic sentiment, but advancing in power of original thought, in ease and fullness of expressional faculty, in breadth of sympathy, in accuracy and extent of perception and observation, in every form of talent, that strengthens and expands the mind. Let us not be understood in claiming these benefits as results from the study of poetry in female schools as intimating, in the least degree, any undervaluation of mathematics and the physical sciences. We know that these are leading agencies in the development of mind. But holding them to their own ground and believing them of vast importance in every scheme of education, we feel all the freer to urge on teachers that they make fair trial of the great poems of English literature. And especially should Paradise Lost receive a large share of critical and scholarly attention. Milton gathered the grandest thoughts of all ages, the loftiest images of the material world, and the profoundest facts of consciousness into the vast receptacle of his genius, and reproduced them, stamped with a wondrous individuality and glowing with an abounding life, in the noblest poem ever written.—No one can study Milton and not feel his or her mind expanded into infinite reaches of thought. Such a great heart, full of mightiest impulses, throbs sublimely into our souls—and Milton's world becomes our dwelling-place.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The ease with which new subscribers are obtained for the New Orleans Christian Advocate will astonish some who have never tried to obtain them—that is, if they shall ever try.

The difference among our preachers in interest for the success of the Advocate, and in successful efforts in behalf of its circulation—is really matter worthy of note.

Many of our preachers are doing noble work for the Advocate. If all did as they do, we should double our circulation this year. This is no exaggeration, but a careful estimate. It is enough to make the heart burn, to see what could be done. So it is with life—a year might accomplish what is done in half a life-time.

Brethren of the ministry and laity, friends in and out of the Church—get new subscribers for the Advocate. Give us the "material aid" necessary to the production of a great, and powerful, and spiritual, and beautiful paper.

Send the money with the name, or pay it to a preacher.

Col. Claiborne writes us that, having laid his hands upon a copy of the Life of Bishop Capers, he is delighted with it. He says: "It is one of the most charming pieces of autobiography I have ever met with. Its simplicity and sincerity are really captivating."

We learn that Col. Claiborne's Life of Gen Samuel Dale will be brought out in the Harpers during the coming Autumn. He has already completed his "Life of Gen. Quitman," and will soon begin the other one.

A LETTER FROM TUSCALOOSA.

Tuscaloosa Methodist Female College—Good Compositions—Brilliant Concert—Affecting Scene—Dr. Linn—Future Prospects—Commencement of the State University—Judge Campbell's Address—Speeches of the Graduates—Future Prospects—D. D's. Poem—Dr. Lord—A Lecture.

As chairman of the Committee appointed at the last session of the Alabama Conference to visit the Female College under its patronage, at Tuscaloosa, it becomes the writer's duty to give information through the Advocate of the merits and advantages, as also the demerits and disadvantages which the Examination, together with a daily familiarity with the Schools has discovered. Without indulging in the hackneyed phrases of commendation in reference to each and all concerned, a simple statement that those vitally interested were delighted with the proficiency of their daughters, will suffice. Passing over the examinations upon the various branches pursued, mentioning only the perfect recitation of a most interesting class in Rhetoric. The compositions of the more advanced young ladies of the Institution, read on the last day, were an index to the character of the instruction received. These compositions were the best in every respect the writer ever heard at a Commencement or Examination, male or female. The Concert the night before, at the Washington Hall, was a most flattering attestation of Professor Grober's talents as an instructor in that department.

On the last day of the Examination at the close of the exercises, just before President Bonnell proceeded to bid farewell to the School, Miss Ellen Guild on behalf of her school associates, stepped forward with a silver service—choice and costly and in the chastest manner, gave expression to sentiments of affection and esteem, not confined to the School. Brother Bonnell has a right to go back to Georgia, and take charge of Macon Female College at the bidding of old friends; but what right has he to plumage our hearts in this way? One has to live here to realize how fully he possesses the confidence and esteem of the people, universally, and the devotion of students and parents. We render back to Georgia her jewel very reluctantly, and bless God we have had a man of such a head, heart and life amongst us. His address to the School, accepting the beautiful offering of affection, was a simple overflow of soul, concluded with a request that struck the fountain-head of sympathy and tears, "that each one there who had given evidence of such respect and confidence towards him, would become an humble follower of the Lord Jesus Christ!"

Rev. J. H. Linn, D. D., of the Kentucky Conference, will take Brother Bonnell's place at the head of the Institution. Dr. Linn has an envinble reputation, and his connection with our College will no doubt prove most fortunate. Rev. F. M. Grace, A. M., known as one of our most judicious and competent men, will continue as professor; and Professor Engler, in charge of the Ornamental Departments and assistant in the higher branches, is a scholar, and a gentleman of superior attainments. The future of this College, under such men can be easily imagined. Parents may send their children to the Methodist College here with entire freedom from doubt.

This duty discharged, a word about the State University, its Commencement, Exercises, etc. Dr. Garland, the President, whose scholarship and excellency otherwise, are so universally known, looked feeble and worn. Perhaps his intense solicitude for the welfare of the Institution has had somewhat to do with infeebling his health. Judge Campbell, one of the judges of the Federal court, supreme, delivered the address before the Literary Societies. A masterly address it was—fraught with sentiments and thoughts worthy of such men as Hammond, Starkie, C. C. Clay, and indicative of such careful reading and study as would please many of our public men, far above the plans upon which they fritter away their mind, life and country. The speeches of the graduates were as usual, unequal. Grave objection to one or two, particularly to one on Byron; evincing more genius than any of the rest, it was such in sentiments (a few saving clauses, too feeble to turn the tide) as was painful to hear, especially from the son of a Methodist preacher. How different the speech of a young man whom I have met teaching a Sabbath-school class at the room near the factory, under the hill! It is to be hoped our young friend will learn the beauties of such characters as Paul and John, of Fletcher and Flavel, John Banyan and Fenelon, for these approximate to that of Him who alone is worthy; and that the hot fumes of the sad and despicable wretch will lose their undue influence over him. Another speech, was not to our taste. It would have been a few years back. The one on South Carolina and her Statesmen. A part of it smelt gutta perchaish! The young man who spoke it looks every inch a man, and will do well no doubt; just missed the figure, that's all. The class numbered twenty-six. The Graduating Class for next year is smaller. A son of our Presiding Elder, Rev. J. J. Hutchinson, leads this class, and will doubtless carry off the honor. A son of Brother Smith of Summerfield takes high rank, and will come through in a manner worthy of his parentage. The crowd in attendance was immense from beginning to end, and a growing interest in the affairs of the College is manifest. The Trustees have adopted the open system, which will bring more students doubtless; but it is to be feared that the standard of scholarship will go down. Numbers, numbers, numbers! is the cry—very well. Let men be influenced by outside clammor, and change successful methods of instruction at haphazard. Let juvenility soften down our Universities and Colleges to the popular point; the farewell to eminent scholarship and to manliness. Wiser heads, however, have pondered this matter, and wiser men have done the deed; time will determine. Rev. G. W. Carter, of the University of Mississippi, had the title of D. D., conferred upon him, but some other college has been ahead of this, as far as he is concerned. Rev.——Lord, of Vicksburg, had one conferred upon him; also Rev.——Petre of Montgomery. This latter minister preached the Commencement sermon of which I cannot speak, as I did not hear it. In compliance with a custom heretofore observed, I closed my Church on the occasion, and went thirteen miles in the country to preach to those who have the gospel but seldom.

I failed to mention that Dr. Lord, of Mississippi, read or delivered, an original poem on "What needs the South?" immediately after Judge Campbell's address. I'll send you a copy. Last night, this gentleman pronounced one of the most excellent lectures on "John Bunyun, as a poet," that we ever listened to, before the Young Men's Christian Association. No more at present.

Tuscaloosa, July 17, 1859. JOSEPH B. COTTRELL.

A CARD.

The undersigned has noticed with regret the publication in the New Orleans Christian Advocate of a letter from Rev. W. Lambuth of the China Mission.

This was a private letter, and very different in character from any ever addressed the author of this article by that brother.

As an act of justice to the Missionary Board, the Treasurer and myself, I make in kindest spirit to all concerned this statement:

As to the funds of the Missionary Society, all know, who are acquainted with the organization of such associations—that, over the funds the Secretary exercises no control, does not retain nor pay out the same.

This is the office and duty of the Treasurer. True, in the routine of correspondence in regard to the transmission of the funds, as to the best time or mode of remitting same, the Secretary has been called upon in regard to this mission to have more or less to do.

The funds have always been remitted at great loss to the Society—sometimes at not less than thirty-six per cent. From a desire to lessen this expense, and from the fact that the funds were not on hand at the time, some delay was experienced on the part of our treasurer in making his last remittance to China. This will not likely again occur; indeed, never will, provided our friends and brethren will keep our treasurer supplied with means.

As to the imputation of want of interest upon the part of the Secretary for this mission, I will leave the heart of the writer of the letter to make his apology. My history in connection with the China Mission is written, and published to the world. In all my letters, reports and addresses, those who have read or heard the same will not charge me with want of interest in behalf of the China mission. Never have I labored so hard for any other—and just now, in labors abundant and severe, for this very mission. This letter is published, but I complain not, so good be accomplished.

I had written Bro. Lambuth, senior, fully on the subjects mentioned in the letter of his son; and suppose my communication was received by him just about the time of the publication of his son's letter.

From Brother Litton I also learn, that the funds were remitted in time to have reached China before or about the time the letter was written.

In regard to special appropriations to the China Mission, misapprehension seems to exist with some of our friends. These sums go into the General Treasury, and form with the other donations, the general amount from which our whole Missionary work is supplied, except when a special collection is designed for the personal benefit of any one of the Missionaries—then, in that count, when properly notified, the source is held sacred for the purpose given.

A legal allowance is made for salary, etc., for each of our Missionaries. The amounts so allowed, and appropriated have always been far beyond the special appropriations which have been made.

In conclusion I would say, many, many discouragements and perplexities have been met by me in advocating and sustaining the claims of the China Mission.

I have, however, published no private letters of complaint, have given no toesin of alarm, have said nothing of the objections urged against the Mission from the return, however necessary of its active and efficient missionaries, and from other causes which have been named. I am now making an earnest effort to raise the Missionary means to strengthen the Mission, and to increase the number of our Missionaries. At two special meetings for this purpose, one at Trinity College, North Carolina, and the other at Oxford, Georgia—some $2400 have been raised for that purpose.

I hope that all our appointed Missionaries for China and Japan will be ready to sail by the first of November next.

Come, Brethren and friends, let us all unite, and with one heart rally anew to the warm support of the great Missionary Enterprise. It is a great and noble work! the greatest, noblest of earth. It has for its object the conversion of the entire world to God. And upon all rests the divine command to engage in the work.

E. W. SEHON, Miss. Secy.

LETTER FROM CHARLESTON.

I left the quiet city of Marion, Alabama, and started towards the North pole. Next morning left Montgomery for Savannah. Stopped in Macon Georgia, and reconnoitered this picturesque city. I pronounce it the most attractive town for its dimension in the South. The Asylum for the blind is located here, and a beautiful mansion have the sons and daughter of a ceaseless night for their residence. When we recollect that Greece in the age of Alcibiades and Pericles, and Rome in her Augustan era, afforded no single asylum for the unfortunate. And then behold in every town in Christendom, of any considerable pretention, alecmosynary institutions. What a tribute of worth is paid to the benevolence of Christianity! At Macon, is the seat of the Wesleyan Female College, the first institution of the kind ever established in the world—and hence, at this time, the oldest of any country.

Macon has many magnificent private residences, broad streets and beautiful parks.

Leaving there, we arrived in Savannah on Wednesday night—after a most fatiguing ride through a very monotonous country.

Savannah is an old city, and preserves the marks of her superannuation in every street. It is just such a place as my fancy has been taught to regard as the home of weird spirits, ghouls, and the revellings of the pestilence. We managed to spend the day pleasantly. The only objects of interest observed were the Pulaski statue and monument, erected to the honor of that distinguished patriot-foreigner who fell in the Revolutionary struggles for liberty. Savannah has a Methodistic interest in the fact that it is integral in the biography of John Wesley.

At five P. M. on Thursday, July 28th, we left the pier on board the U. S. Mail Steamship "Huntsville," bound for New York city. She had on board 120 passengers, and a large cargo of cotton, rice and flour.

On Friday morning I arose early, and feeling symtoms of sea-sickness, laid down upon a sofa. I had scarcely composed myself when Mr. Hawley, of Summerfield, Alabama, my traveling companion, came down from the deck, and informed me that the ship was on fire.

I knew from his serious countenance that he was not hoaxing me, and a feeling or terror shot like a stroke of lightning through my heart; for of all deaths, deliver me from one on a burning ship, many miles from home and friends, out upon the fathomless deep.

I immediately went on deck and saw the crew unshipping the life-boats; the smoke was coming out of the hold through the crevices abaft the pilot house. The broad ocean heaving heavily, neither land nor sail anywhere in sight. The Captain said that we were 60 miles from any port, and that he was then trying to run her into the port of Charleston.

In about half an hour I went on deck, most of the male passengers came up, and just then we espied a sail far off to the leeward. The Captain ordered the Union Jack down—and in 30 minutes more the vessel saw this signal of distress and ran down towards us. She reach us at 8 o'clock, A. M., and proved to be the good pilot boat "Savannah, No. 7."

Our hearts bounded with joy, for the wind was blowing fresh from the North-east, the sea was rough, and it would have been extremely hazardous to trust to the boats. By a quarter to nine we had the ladies on board the pilot boat. The male passengers remained on the ship, determined if she perished, they would be the last to leave the noble bark to her fate.

One lady, with Spartan prowess refused to leave the ship without her husband. She received three hearty huzzas from the passengers.

After having secured the ladies, our steamer started again for Charleston, 30 miles off. By the aid of her powerful engins and heavy sails, we were enabled to run her aground on the bar in Bench Channel by 11 A. M. The passengers were speedily landed by the boats upon Sullivan's Island, and reached the city about two o'clock, by the steam ferry-boat "Osiris," which came to our assistance.

The U. S. revenue cutter "Wm. Aiken," rendered valuable aid in removing the baggage—much of which however was lost.

The fire, being in the cotton in the hold and the hatches being kept down, burned very slowly; and at high tide, at three o'clock, the "Huntsville" was towed up to the city where the fire Department of Charleston was in waiting to flood her. About six o'clock this (Saturday) morning, they succeeded in filling her with water, and hence extinguished the fire.

I escaped, with life and baggage; and will, this 6 P. M., deo volente, take passage on the steamship "James Adger," from Charleston for New York, trusting in that great being who

"Plants his footsteps on the sea
And rides upon the storm."

Once I have looked death fairly in the face. To me I was not uneasy, would he untrue; yet I felt that if I had to die, I would, with a prayer to God and a light trust in his gracious promises, leap from the fire-robed ship into eternity.

Grateful for his preservation, I feel disposed to dedicate anew to God's service that life which has been almost miraculously spared. The passengers and crew on the "Huntsville" acted heroically; There was no screaming, but all remained quietly abiding the fearful end that awaited us.

Charleston is a busy-looking city. Has several streets of fine business-houses, and is altogether an attractive place.

A handsome monument has been erected by the [illegible] fleece of South Carolinians in honor of the Palmetto regiment, of Mexican renown.

While in Charleston, I called on Dr. Meyers, Editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, and found him a sedate, affable gentleman—busy at work preparing copy for next week's paper. The Southern Christian Advocate is printed upon a steam press. The book depository room looked in order, though I should imagine the day on which I saw it was one of unusual leisure. There is great danger of multiplying these depots for books beyond a paying point. But my letter is already long. Possibly I may give you a hurrygraph now and then.

EUROPEAN CONFEDERATIONS.

1805—1859.

An Italian Confederation is one of the prominent results of the victorious of the Emperor Napoleon III. over the Austrian armies in Italy in 1859.

The Confederation of the Rhine was one of the fruits of the great victory of Austerlitz, by which Napoleon I. overthrew the Austrian Empire in 1805.

The battle of Austerlitz and the Confederation of the Rhine, which followed it, were the extinguishment of the old Germanic Empire. The new Italian Confederation is conceived in a spirit of antagonism to the German Confederation, which is the successor of the old empire, a counterpoise of Southern Europe under the protectorship of France, which is to be held as a counter weight in the distribution of power to the Tentonic races of the North.

A brief account of that Confederation, and the circumstances under which it was formed, is opportune to the understanding of the new arrangement, by which the nephew may propose to follow in the footsteps of the uncle.

Anciently, the union of the German States and Imperial houses under one central head, made the Empire of Germany. The Emperor was originally elective; but forms had fallen into disuse, or rather, for many years the elections had become mere formalities, and the Empire became hereditary, in fact, in the house of [illegible] for several centuries, until it was extinguished by the events of 1805, when Francis II., grandson of the famous Empress Maria Louisa, was the last German Emperor.

The battle of Austerlitz was fought December 2, 1805. The winter and spring succeeding were devoted to negotiations and family arrangements, in which Napoleon treed from the influence of Austria.

In consequence of the creation of this Confederation the Emperor Francis renounced his title of Emperor of Germany, and assumed that of Emperor of Austria, his hereditary throne.

The Empire of Germany was never reconstructed. The Confederation of the Rhine lasted under the protectorship of Napoleon so long as his fortunes enabled him to keep his control in Germany. When he was defeated at Leipsic in 1813, and withdrew within the boundaries of the Rhine, the Confederation was dissolved. The Great Powers at Vienna constructed, upon the basis of the States of which the Empire consisted into a confederation under French protectorship—the consequent dissolution of the Empire, which never recovered.

Napoleon's prodigious successes—his great victories and the enthusiasm which the French support created among the lesser powers of Germany, enabled him to make a treaty with three of them—the sovereigns of Bavaria, Wurtemburg and Baden—by which they agreed to form a Confederation of the States in the valley of the Rhine, adjacent to France, to be under the protectorship of the French Emperor. These three only were consulted in the formation of the Confederation; other German Houses had the privilege of becoming members by signing. Sixteen German Princes signed. The boundaries of the proposed union were prescribed; but Princes whose domains were included could not join as sovereign Princes, unless so named in the act. They became what was called mediatized; that is, they severed their direct connection with the head of the Empire or Confederation and fell under the authority of the sovereign of that territory, described in the consecutive act, which included their own. By this process, which was subsequently confirmed by the congress of Vienna, a large number of the small sovereignties of Germany were extinguished. There were originally nearly a hundred sovereign houses and cities of Germany. They are now thirty-nine.

The Confederation was composed of States, each sovereign, but in a perpetual state of alliance offensive and defensive with France. Any war, in which either should be engaged, was to be common now to both. France agreed to furnish a contingent army of 200,000 men, and the Confederation 63,000, in various proportions. The affairs of the Confederation to be managed by two colleges chosen by the several States, with the Archbishop of Ratisbon, as Prince Arch-Chancellor, as President, and the Emperor Napoleon as Protector. On the death of the Arch-Chancellor, the President was to be named by the Emperor of France. They made a declaration of perpetual separation from the German Empires. The Archbishop of Mentz was the first Arch-Chancellor to preside in the Diet of the Confederation which was established at Frankfort.

The Confederation increased its numbers as the power of Napoleon increased. Saxony abandoned the North Germanic League, which was afterward attempted to be formed by Prussia, as a counterpoise to this, and joined the Confederation. So did Westphalia, when it was made a kingdom for the benefit of Jerome Bonaparte, and five or six other and smaller principalities followed until the numbers reached to twenty-three, and the contingent to the armies of the Confederation to about 127,000 men.

The original treaty, which formed this Confederation was published on the morning of the 12th July, 1806. The treaty of Villafranca, which announced the formation of an Italian Confederation, was published on the 12th of July, 1859.

The Confederation announced their decision at once to the old Germanic Diet, which then met at Ratisbon, to the Emperor of Austria, as the Emperor of Germany, and to the King of Prussia, as the leading powers in the Empire. To the Diet it was a simple announcement that the Confederation no longer acknowledged its members of the Germanic Empire. The Germanic Emperor was told that the Empire was effete—without power to protect its members or defend itself; and Prussia was simply advised of the fact, with the intimation that the new Confederation would not object to see a similar Confederation of the northern Germanic States freed from the influence of Austria.

In consequence of the creation of this Confederation the Emperor Francis renounced his title of Emperor of Germany, and assumed that of Emperor of Austria, his hereditary throne.

The Empire of Germany was never reconstructed. The Confederation of the Rhine lasted under the protectorship of Napoleon so long as his fortunes enabled him to keep his control in Germany. When he was defeated at Leipsic in 1813, and withdrew within the boundaries of the Rhine, the Confederation was dissolved.

of this Confederation, the General Confederation of all the States of Germany, which now exists.

The general impression in regard to the articles of the new compact just made by Austria and France, for Italy, is that the new Italian Confederation is to be based on this model; that the Pope is to be the Chancellor or President of the Diet, and that the French Emperor is to be substantially the protector of this, as his predecessor was of the old Germanic union.

RELIGIOUS HUMBUG.

Humbug is one of the necessaries evils of free institutions, free speech, and a progressive civilization. It is one of the many abuses of civil and religious liberty—a parasite—in Georgia farmers' phrase, a "sucker," growing up from the root of the rich young corn. "This is a free country," and humbug is free to flourish, the farmer "suckers" his corn, but Humbug disputes with Truth the credit of being the true "stalk," and often wins. Multitudes of the most patriotic citizens and earnest Christians of this country are, this day, in many respects, the dupes of political demagogues and religious humbugs. So it is, to a lamentable extent, in education and literature. It is a sad admission, but it is undeniable that religious humbug is increasingly rampant in "this great and glorious country." And of all humbugs in the world, religious humbug is the most—we were about to say diabolical, but it has not dignity enough to be associated with his Satanic majesty—it is simply below contempt. We have heretofore had a few tilts with various forms of this fungus civilization and Christianity, and therefore feel no slight degree of pleasure at seeing our brother of the Texas Christian Advocate wielding his "Damascus blade" with such effect upon one of the offensive of them all. See the wounds he has inflicted upon that contemptible system of religious charlatantry called the "Southern Aid Society." He says: A few of those, Northern all-strained-on-the-same-last ministers want to come South—for their health, and have instituted a "Southern Aid Society," for the purpose of raising funds to build them Churches where they can preach once or twice a week to a dozen of hearers, eating fresh oysters between times, in the winter, and spiced and iced dnatics in the summer, at the expense of Northern missionary societies—writing home occasionally to sock-darning female relatives and wonder-hunting editors that they do sincerely "hope and trust" that the Lord is owning their feeble ministry; the occasion of this hopefulness being that two out of their dozen hearers, disturbed by the snoring of the others, kept partially awake on last Sabbath, while the preacher was reading a discourse from the barrel of his grand-father upon the seven lean kine of Egypt—penned in with three or four psalms of fourteen verses each, and an equal number of hereditary prayers, as long as drawling enunciation, latitude of thought, and every imaginable thing that was neither wanted or expected, could make them; and this is what the "Southern Aid Society" means by" the evangelization of the South."

EDUCATIONAL.

Andrew College, Trenton, Tenn., belongs to the Memphis Conference. The Commencement exercises for the present year occurred early in July. Prof. Randle addressed the Alumni. Mr. T. W. Byars addressed the literary societies. The honorary degree of D. D., was conferred upon the Rev. Pres. Cruven, of Trinity College, N. C. President Jones resigned his office, preferring the more active duties of the itinerancy. The Visiting Committee speak of the College in terms of high praise.

Cokesbury School—"Old Cokesbury"—recently had an important meeting of its Board of Trustees. Dr. Wightman, one of the two remaining members of the original Board, resigned. Rev. S. B. Jones, Rector, resigned, and Mr. Robt. W. Boyd was elected in his place. More than forty ministers have been sent out from this hallowed place, and Cokesbury still devises more liberal things for the education of indigent young men for the ministry. The Institution is reported as in a prosperous condition.

Spartanburgh Female College, S. C., which President has just left, had an encouraging Examination and Commencement. Much credit is given to the President and to his gifted and accomplished lady.

Wofford College Spartanburgh, S. C., lately presided over by Dr. Wightman, has elected in his stead, Rev. A. M. Shipp, D. D., late of the University of North Carolina—a most suitable selection. Rev. Dr. Whitefoord Smith resigns the Chair of English Literature, and Rev. Dr. D. S. Doggett has been elected in his stead. The examination is highly spoken of. Fourteen young men graduated. Wofford College is one of the great educational institutions of the South, and, in coming years, with Greensboro, Auburn, Florence, Randolph, Macon, Centenary, and others, will rival Yale and Harvard, and Princeton.

Clarksville Female Academy, Clarksville, Tenn., under the Presidency of Rev. A. L. Hamilton, D. D., recently closed its Commencement. The School is but one year old, but is represented as highly successful. Nineteen young ladies graduated. The address was delivered by John F. House Esq. The Institution belongs to the Tennessee Conference.

Wesleyan Female College, Macon, Ga., is the first Female College ever established in this country, perhaps in the world. It is said to have been the result of an eloquent speech of Hon. Daniel Chandler, of Mobile, Ala., at Franklin College, Athens, Ga., in which he earnestly advocated the right of woman to collegiate culture. At the recent Commencement, the sermon was by Rev. Jas. S. Key. The address was delivered by Rev. P. P. Neely, D. D., of the Alabama Conference, in his most eloquent style. The Examination was equal to the reputation of the College.

Tulip Female College, belonging to the Ouachita Conference, had its Commencement late in June. Rev. W. P. Ratcliffe preached the Sermon, an able one. Rev. J. A. Stanly delivered the annual address. The Visiting Committee report very favorably of the examination, and congratulate the Conference in view of the prosperity of their Female College.

Fletcher Institute is a male and Female Institution belonging to the Florida Conference. It has struggled hard for existence during a long season of adversity, but is now reported hopefully prosperous. The recent examination, or review, at the close of the summer term, gave much satisfaction and encouragement to all concerned. Florida is deeply interested in the success of this institution, and of her other schools also.

SUDDEN CLOSE OF THE WAR IN ITALY.

A very general surprise has been created by the news from Europe. Its most startling feature is that a treaty of peace has been signed between the belligerent powers, in a personal interview between the Emperors of France and Austria, inasmuch as the armistice was only signed on the 8th of July, and that on the 10th, Napoleon in announcing the armistice to his soldiers, declared his purpose of returning to Paris, while the dispatch announcing the conclusion of the basis of peace is dated July 11, the amicable proposition must have been suddenly made, and as suddenly accepted.

As briefly stated in the Emperor's dispatch to the Empress, that basis embraces the following particulars: the Italian States are to be formed into a confederacy, under the "honorary Presidency" of the Pope; Austria is to cede Lombardy to France, with the understanding that it is to be trasferred to the King of Sardinia, and Become part of his Kingdom; while Venice is to be retained by Austria, but only with a qualified possession, it having a place in the Italian Confederation. Napoleon III. redeems his pledge given to the European powers that France would acquire no territory by the war. As a compliment to the real victor, and as the course least humiliating to the vanquished, Lombardy is assigned to France, and Sardinia receives it from her and not from Austria. So that Napoleon's promise is fulfilled, and as far as possible the feelings of Francis Joseph are spared. Those who have repeatedly and persistantly doubted Napoleon's good faith in this respect are rebuked and silenced by the first provisions of the treaty.

But when we come to the other provisions of this treaty of peace, the satisfactory character is less general. The letter of Louis Napoleon's promises in relation to the liberation of Italy is apparently violated. We use the word "apparently," because, in our judgment, very much depends in this relation upon the exact meaning to be given to the expression, "honorary Presidency" of the Pope. Leaving that expression for the present out of consideration, we repeat that the Emperor of France does not seem to have achieved all he promised when he entered upon the war. Venice is as much a part of Italy as Lombardy; and it is further the stronghold of Austria in Italy, for there are her fortified places. These she retains, and by means of these can maintain a firm hold and exercise her despotic will over Venice.

But this cession of Venice to Francis Joseph is not unqualified. It does not become a part of his Empire. He is to be not Emperor, but King, of Venice, and that not absolutely but with limitation. Venice is to be a member of the Confederacy of Italy, and Francis Joseph, as its owner and ruler, is but to have a voice in the confederated councils with other Italian rulers, Princes or Kings.

And now as to the nature and value of the promised boon to the Italian States. They are to be formed into a Confederacy "under the Pope, as honorary President," what are known as the "States of the Church" included. The anomalous position thus assigned to the Pope is probably a compromise, the Emperor of France being desirous to dwindle him of temporal power and the Emperor of Austria pleading for the abandonment of such a purpose, and the meaning of the language (the word "honorary" being tautological) is that the Pope shall stand at the head of the confederacy, but that the actual government—the power of making and enforcing laws—shall rest with the representatives of the States in congress or council assembled.

Supposing this view of the matter to be correct, Louis Napoleon probably redeemed his promise on behalf of Italy, so far as it was in his power, and perhaps further knowledge of events may show that he has done this wisely and well. Austria's co-operation was needed to establish this new order of things. Probably she only could influence the Pope to be a party to it, and without his assent even such a step toward the melioration of Italy's condition would probably never have been taken. Nor is it improbable that this will ultimately prove the surest and most permanent regeneration of Italy. The measure strikes at and destroys the absolutism of the most absolute of temporal sovereignties—that of the Pope. It gives the Italians an opportunity of trying, upon a limited scale, the experiment of solidarity and nationalization, for although we apprehend that the rulers or princess of the Italian states, and not popular representatives, will for the present form the Congress or legislative and administrative Council, yet a great point is gained by the confederation, as many of those rulers will be a check upon those exercises of despotism by which some of the Italian States have been oppressed.

One great boon, at least, will be conferred upon the world if the provisions of the treaty accord with its declared basis and are faithfully carried out—a boon the granting of which we all but prophesied on Saturday last—viz: that the supremacy of the temporal power of the Pope is practically brought to an end. It requires no great faith to regard this as the entering wedge—the sure forerunner of civil freedom—the aghast Italy.

NAPOLEON, THE INCOMPREHENSIBLE.

This ought to be the title of Napoleon III. He puzzles every one. The London Times for instance has long known that he designs an invasion of England, and even assumed to fix the year and month, if not even the day, when the English people would be called upon to defend "their altars and their fires," and "the green graves of their sires" from the assaults of this incomprehensible man of the time and his terrible legions. That journal knew that the defences at Cherbourg, the increased fleet at Toulon, and the camp at Chalons were but preparations for this grand enterprise. Napoleon kept his counsel and the Times was puzzled. He threw his armies upon Austria, instead of upon England, and the astonished "thunderer" exclaims "How incomprehensible!"

But it must go on to predict, thinking that now at least it comprehended Napoleon. He longed after conquest and had almost the American filibuster's passion for acquisition. He would chent Sardinia and make all Italy a dependency of France. And not a few shared in this belief. The war is ended; Austria, humbled, yields up Lombardy to France and Napoleon immediately transfers it to Sardinia, and again there is a universal exclamation that the man is incomprehensible. In the zenith of his successes he proposes an armistice to his vanquished enemy, and promptly accepts a peace on terms that, as yet at least, are comprehended by none and are wondered at by all. All his acts are enigmas at the time they are performed, but when the mystery comes to be unravelled it is plain that the man has carefully considered every step, calculated all the contingencies and wrought just the effect he designed. However puzzling or startling his policy may be it always tends to the augmentation of his own moral power among nations.

It must be acknowledged that taking the Emperor's despatch to the Empress—as the exposition of the basis of the treaty of peace, it does not seem as though Napoleon had accomplished all that he had promised. It must not be forgotten, however, that this incomprehensible man is notoriously taciturn and secretive. He says no more than is necessary for his present purpose. It may, therefore, be that the bases of the treaty are more comprehensive than they at the first glance appear to be, and that radical changes in the government of the Italian states are comprised, as was yesterday suggested, in the honorary Presidency of the Pope.

It is suggested that this sudden sinking of peace with Austria looks to a future mutual understanding between the two Emperors in the conduct of European affairs. As the Emperor of France won the friendship and good will of Russia by proposing a peace just as farther humiliation threatened the Czar, so he seeks to secure the good will of Austria by his moderation in the hour of victory, designing to use Austria for the punishment of Prussia for the inimical attitude she has assumed in the present war.

The Courrier des Etas Unis, has the following on the treaty of peace: "The boundary which separates Lombardy and Venice is not the Mincio but the Adige, and consequently unless special stipulations to the contrary are made, the cession of Lombardy involves essentially that of Peschiera and Mantua, which have never been part of Venice. The famous quadrilateral is then literally annihilated, since it finds itself now divided between two powers opposing Peschiera to Verona and Mantua to Ligneno, thus assuming on the part of each an equally imposing protection to the frontier."

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, August 8, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 6th instant: The past week has been decidedly the dullest of the season, in all departments of the market, and nothing has transpired calling for extended remark. The stocks of our leading staples are low and poorly assorted, and we shall have little activity to notice until a new season fairly opens upon new supplies.

On Saturday morning European advices were before the public, brought by the steamar Queen of the Ocean. The Liverpool Cotton market was reported very dull, and a decline of ⅛ to ¼d. was noticed, with sales for three days of 17,000 bales. On Sunday the Kangaroo's advices, reported a rather firmer market with sales of 7000 bales, the quotation for Middling being 7 3-16d. Manchester advices were rather unfavorable, and Consols had further declined, being quoted at 95 to 95¼. On Wednesday the advices by the regular weekly Cunard steamer Persia came to hand. They report the week's sales of Cotton at Liverpool to have been 50,000 bales, and prices had recovered somewhat at the close, the decline for the week being ⅛d. and the quotations 8¼d. for Fair Orleans and 7¼d. for Middling ditto. The stock in port was stated at 995,000 bales, of which 620,000 bales were American. The advices from Manchester were favorable, as there was an improved demand for goods, with no advancing tendency in prices. At Havre the Cotton market was steady, and 112 francs was still the quotation given for tres ordinaire. Consols had further declined ⅛ per cent, being quoted at 94⅛ to 94⅜.

The weather has been generally clear and very warm throughout the past week, and the city remains remarkably healthy, an official notice of the Board of Health stating that there has not yet been a single case of yellow fever. The river has fallen 10 inches within the week and is now nearly 11 feet below high water mark.

COTTON.—The past week has been decidedly the dullest of the season in the Cotton market, the first three days of the week having passed with sales of less than 100 bales, and the entire business of the week summing up barley 2600 bales, and since 1st September, (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,661,545, bales against 1,659,48, bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 3869 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 5th inst., 35,035. In prices a good deal of irregularity has prevailed, and the advantage, especially within the past few days, has been generally on the side of purchasers but there seems to no marked change calling for a reduction of our figures, and we continue previous quotations. On Monday, the 1st instant, the first bale of the new crop from the Mississippi Valley was received from the parish of Tensas. It was well matured, of good color and staple, but somewhat gin-cut. It classed Strict Middling and was promptly sold at the fancy price of 13½ cents per pound. This bale came to hand four days earlier than the first bale from the Mississippi Valley last year, but its receipt is no true indication of the position of the general crop, which is understood to be some days later than last year, as the crop from which this bale was taken was planted very early, and escaping frost reached an early maturity. The receipts of new crop up to this date are six bales, against three bales last year.

THE HOME CIRCLE FOR 1860.

Important Announcement.

Determined to place the Home Circle in such a position that it shall stand without a rival in its line, and command the suffrages of every member of the M. E. Church, South, the Publisher takes this method of announcing that it will be issued January 1st, 1860, with several entirely new and attractive features.

The magazine will contain, as heretofore, 64 pp., royal octavo, and will be printed in the very first style, upon fine paper, with a new and elegant engraved cover; but it is intended, by liberal expenditure and judicious arrangements, to make it far more worthy of patronage than ever before.

Foremost among the attractions to be presented will be an original series of Portraits of Distinguished Members of the M. E. Church, South, both male and female, embracing representatives from every Conference in the Connection, engraved expressly for the purpose. In addition to this, each number will be embellished with a steel-plate engraving, constituting a series which it is intended shall embrace eventually all the principal points of beauty or interest in the Southern States, and comprising Mountains and Valleys, Hills and Dales, Lakes, Rivers and Cataracts, Town and Country Public Buildings, Schools and Colleges, Churches and Private Villas; the whole constituting an entirely unique feature in works of this class, and presenting a claim upon the patronage of the members of the M. E. Church, South, and upon all lovers of the beautiful, such as has never before been offered.

It is needless to say that the execution of this design involves a very heavy outlay of money, amounting to thousands of dollars; but, believing that a vastly enlarged subscription-list will amply reward the enterprise, and resolved to merit that increase, the Publisher has determined upon adding still another and important feature to those already named; consequently, besides the above, every number will contain two magnificent Woodcut Illustrations of incidents in the life of the great Reformer, Martin Luther, engraved in the very highest style of the art. Those engravings (fifty in number) will be accompanied by four pages of descriptive letter-press, printed in beautiful style; the whole constituting a series which will run through twenty-six consecutive numbers. These pages will be printed so as to fold by themselves, and may be separated from the rest of the number and bound together; and thus, at the expiration of the series, each subscriber will be possessed, without cost, of one of the most elegant volumes, ever published, "The Life of Martin Luther, in fifty pictures."

But the Publisher, well aware that pictorial illustration constitutes only a portion of the claims of any magazine to favor and support, has made ample arrangements to enhance the interest and value of the Literary Department. The Editor, the Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D., will continue to spread his monthly "feast of fat things" for the delectation of his readers; and his energies will kindle, and his pen sparkle, in proportion to the number of kindly faces he finds around his editorial table. The assistance, also, of a numerous Corps of Gifted Contributors has been secured.

Great as are the improvements thus announced, and the additional expense involved, the Publisher wishes it distinctly understood that he does not intend to relax in his efforts, still further to improve and embellish the magazine, and to make it what it ought to be—and must be—the best magazine of its class in the United States.

It is in contemplation to add, at no distant day, a Musical Department, under the supervision of an eminent Professor of Music; and as an enlarged subscription-list shall justify, still other important additions, useful and ornamental, will be made to the present list of claims upon patronage.

TERMS.—The subscription price will remain as heretofore, $2,00 per annum, strictly in advance, in all funds.

All orders for the Home Circle, and all letters on business, must be addressed to J. B. M'Ferrin, Agent, Nashville, Tenn.

Communications having reference to the Literary Department will be addressed to the Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D., Nashville, Tennessee.

INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.

Every traveling preacher or other agent is entitled to retain 20 per cent. (10 cents) on each subscription forwarded in our funds to the Publisher. In addition to this liberal discount, every agent forwarding the money for Twenty Subscribers, or upwards, shall receive, at the end of the year, free per mail, a copy of the Home Circle, handsomely bound.

☞ Agents should be early in the field, and subscriptions should be sent in as soon as possible, that all demands may be promptly met.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

"'Twas for His Mother's Sake."

BY MRS. L. E. HOOGURNEY.

"Let me kiss him for his mother." These were the original words. The history of them has been published again and again in this paper, where the incident was first made known. A strange young man, from Maine, died of yellow fever, and, as the coffin was about to be removed, an old lady remarked, "Let me kiss him for his mother," and so she did. The account has been published in almost every paper in the United States. Sometimes the New Orleans Christian Advocate has been credited, and sometimes not. After inspiring many other and unknown poets, Mrs. Sigourney, one of the most beautiful-spirited women in the United States, and a sweet poet as well as popular writer, has made it the theme of the verses below, with the above head.

He died amid a stranger band,
Though in his native clime.
The fever smote him, and he fell
In his fresh morning prime.
A strong and stalwart youth was he,
Bear'd 'mid the hills of Maine,
And in his wild, delicious dream
He saw those hills again.

No voice of kindred soothed his pain,
Nor watch'd his sleepless nights,
Or cool'd the burning lip that verg'd
Into the deathly white;
But unknown hands in haste prepared
The narrow coffin bed,
And a small funeral group drew near
While hasty prayers were said.

But ere the coffin-lid they clos'd,
An ancient woman prest
Forth that group, and laid her hands
Upon that pulseless breast,
And with a solemn fervor kiss'd
"'Tis for his mother's sake," she said,
And mournful turned away.

And so that mother's friendship-seal
Down to his grave he bore,
Who never to their cottage-home
Shall greet her darling more;
While many an eye unused to weep
Felt lingering moisture break,
To hear that aged woman's words—
"'Twas for his mother's sake."

Shreveport, January 19th, 1859.

The author took ship during the fever in New Orleans, in the autumn of 1853.

Terrible Conflict With a Catamount.

The dwelling of Mr. Thos. S. Bisland, of this parish, was lately the scene of a most strange and desperate encounter with a catamount in which several negroes were severely bitten, and much alarm created amongst the occupants of the house.

The plantation is one of the oldest on the bayou, and the dwelling, a noble one, is located amidst a cluster of live oak and water oaks, with a few pecan and other trees of the forest. Except a few evergreens that skirt the bayou there is nothing in the shape of a lurking place for such animals save those the swamp on either side in the rear of the cultivated fields. Some two weeks since a negro man heard a noise in the cabin lot above the [illegible] where a servant or two lived, and upon repairing to the spot was met by a strange animal, whereupon the negro retreated leisurely by the monster. Some of the negroes came out, attracted by her cries, and seeing the woman retreating for his master's gun and discharged it, inflicting a slight wound. The second shot did not take effect, and frightened at the approach of so formidable an antagonist, he threw down his gun to fly, hastily turned ere it fastened upon his back with its fangs, and seized him by the neck, in which situation he rushed into the house, calling loudly for assistance.

His master who had not yet dressed, peeped out, and alarmed for his family, closed the door again, doubtless deeming discretion the better part of valor.

Satisfied with having prostrated his first antagonist, who lay helpless on the floor of the hall, his catamountship inspected the princely apartments on the first floor when the negroes arrived from the sugar house he seated himself on the front piazza and calmly surveyed some dozen or more of them. Satisfied with the scrutiny he entered the parlor or sitting room and took formal possession, and when the door was opened by a negro man he flew at him and seized him by the throat. The negro was a powerful man and after being severely lacerated got him under his feet when four balls were fired into his head from a revolver in the hand of a bystander. The overseer who had now reached the spot, deeming him dead ordered the negro to remove his feet, when, to the amazement of all present, he sprang upon a third negro, but was knocked off by a blow from a club and finally killed with a load of buckshot from a gun, opportunely brought by the overseer.

This is certainly one of the most singular conflicts of the kind we ever heard of, occurring, as it did, in a dwelling removed apparently from all danger from the visits of such animals. We hear that the proprietor intends preserving the skin stuffed in a glass case as a trophy to be shown to his visitors; and really the circumstances under which it was obtained will surround it with no little interest. It was fortunate that no children were about, as they must have fallen an easy prey to so resolute and ferocious an enemy. He seems to have been a very large animal of his species, equalling in size and weight a medium sized dog. [St. Mary's (La.) Banner.

What a Dying Little Boy Said.

BY CHARLES TAYLOR.

When I was traveling on the Washington Circuit, in the South Carolina Conference, fourteen years ago, there was a little boy, nine years old, named James Littleton Dukes, who lived near one of my appointments. He had been sick about four weeks, when, one day, he became suddenly animated, and exclaimed, "Glory hallelujah! I'll soon be over Jordan; I'll soon be with my little sister in heaven! Father and mother, I want you to meet me in heaven!" The next day, when he had been talking with his mother about that little sister, who had died before he was born, she asked him, "Littleton, how will you know your little sister, when you have never seen her?" "O, mother," said he, "I shall know her, and all my other kin that are there, too." He then held out his little pale, thin hand, and shook hands with all who were about his bed saying, "Good-bye to you all; in a few hours I shall leave you. Father, and Mother, and sisters, I want you all to meet me in heaven. But I don't want any of you to see that bad place, where the devil will be, I want you all to go to heaven where there will be peace and joy forever." To a friend who had just come in, he repeated the same wish, adding, "You know you have got a little sister in heaven, too; and tell all your brother and sisters to meet me there." He then threw his little thin, white arms around his father's neck, and, drawing him lovingly unto himself, said, "Father I want you to make preparation to meet me in heaven." To one of his uncles, who was a worthy local preacher he repeated the same request, as often expressed to others, that he would meet him in heaven, and tell everybody else to meet him there, too. This good uncle then asked him if he was not afraid to die. "O no, I want to die; I have got but one death to die, and I want to die."

His parents stood weeping by his bedside, and he said to them, "Father and mother, you are shedding your tears for me; but don't cry—I'll come and see you every day!" At one time during the morning, while his mother was alone with him, he had been lying with his eyes closed, when suddenly he opened them, clapped his hands, and a heavenly smile spread all over his face. Presently soon his sight began to grow so dim, that he could not see those around him, and he asked, "Where are father and mother, and brother and sisters?" and, without waiting for an answer, replied, "Away in the cold, lonesome woods." For this gloomy and cheerless did this world doubtless then seem to him, in contrast with the one that was opening so gloriously before him! Just before his death, he repeated the first verse of one of the hymns his father used to sing at morning worship, beginning, and sang it in a clear, sweet, mournful voice. Yes, little child saint, that "morning sun" that was then rising upon thee, will never more go down!

"See how the morning sun!"

He then faintly uttered a short prayer, and, soon after it, said, "Lord, don't stay. The Lord's a-coming, and I'm going with him." And so he went to be for ever with the Lord.

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

A GEM OF SOUTHERN VERSE.

We are indebted, says the Picayune, to Mr. Walter Morton, of this city, for the following beautiful tribute to a Southern home, which he tells us has never before been published:

To the "VIOLET HOME," the Residence of the Misses Morton, at Columbus, Ga. By Caroline Lee Hentz.

Sweet violet home, the fragrant air
That round thee breathes, proclaims
The flowers that own thy guardian care,
And the white cottage names.

Rich is the violet's breath of balm,
And fair its purple bloom;
But there's another dearer charm,
In this sweet "Violet Home."

I love thy graceful winding chain
Of mingled flowers and shells,
But more I love the gentle twain
That in thy bosom dwells.

Dear sisters! in thy hearts there lives
A sweeter, fairer bloom,
Than decks the violet's velvet leaves,
Or gives its deep perfume.

What though the willow's* bough no more
Weeps o'er the violet's bed,
May this loved bosom ne'er deplore
Its lowly honors shed.

Ne'er may the blighting wind and storm
The violet home impair,
But may the richest sunbeams warm
And beam in blessings there.

* A beautiful weeping willow waved in front of the cottage, but was destroyed by a gale of wind.

TEETH.

Dr. Hayes, an eminent surgeon dentist residing in London, gives the following useful hints about the care of teeth. They are simple, timely, and deserve attention. In the first place, the teeth should be fairly used. By this I mean, not made to perform the duties of crackers for nuts, experimented on to ascertain their strength, or by ladies to rival scissors in cutting thread; for rest assured, in every case—more particularly the last—the party having recourse to such practices will surely come day rue them; the teeth so unwittingly injured being always the first to part company with their fellows. Those who indulge in such or similar habits may be truly called the dentist's friend. Cleanliness is absolutely essential for the preservation of the teeth, and they should be well brushed at least morning and evening, that any feculence which may be attached to them, either during sleep from the stomach, or day by day from meals, may not be allowed permanently to adhere, causing firstly discoloration, then tartar, and subsequently, if I may so express myself, undermining the constitution of one or more, as from their position they may be more or less liable to corrosion.

In order that the teeth should look natural—that is, retain their natural color—a dentifrice free from the smallest particle of acid should be used at the matin hour, and the mouth rinsed with tepid water, for extremes of heat and cold are most highly prejudical not only to their color but also to their durability; and I know no method so simple of converting a really useful and ornamental set into one of pain and subsequently extinction, than the use of washing in one or the other. The person who habituates himself or herself to any extent, to hot soap, tea or other drink, assuredly rivals the friend to the dentist just named. Brushes for the teeth should be of medium substance, of bristle, and those made on what is called the penetrating principle are best. I would also observe that children, at any early age, should be instructed in the use of tooth-brush, and taught the value and importance of the teeth, in order to inculcate habits of cleanliness and a due appreciation of the ornaments of the mouth. A brush properly selected—not too hard—may be used by children of five years of age, every morning, and by being part and parcel of the general ablution, and thus directing habitual attention to the teeth, a useful and cleanly habit will be engendered which will probably ensure for them proper care through life.

ST. GEORGE OF ENGLAND A HUMBUG.

George of Cappadocia, born at Epiphania in Cilicia, was a low parasite, who got a lucrative contract to supply the army with bacon. A rogue and an informer, he got rich and had to run from justice. He saved his money, embraced Arianism, collected a library, and got promoted by a faction to the Episcopal throne of Alexandria. When Julian came, A.D. 361, George was thrown into prison; the prison was burst open by the mob, and George was lynched as he deserved. And this precious knave became, in good time, St. George of England, patron of chivalry, emblem of victory and the pride of the best blood of the modern world. Strange that the solid truth-speaking Briton should derive from an impostor! Strange that the New World should have no better luck—that broad America must wear the name of a thief. Amerigo Vespucci, the pickle-dealer at Seville, who went out in 1499, a subaltern with Hojeda, and whose highest naval rank was boatswain's mate in an expedition that never sailed, managed in this lying world to supplant Columbus, and baptize half the world with his own dishonest name. Thus nobody can throw stones. We are equally badly off in our founders; and the false pickle-dealer is an offset to the false bacon-seller.—R. W. Emerson.

REV. GEORGE LANE.

An interesting biography of Rev. G. Lane, whose death was announced in our paper sometime since, has recently appeared in the Advocate and Journal, in which we find the following relative to his early ministry: "In 1808 Mr. Lane was appointed to the Holland Purchase as a missionary. His field lay in the western portion of the State of New York, and up Lake Erie into Pennsylvania. The settlements were scarse, the people poor, in some instances almost reduced to starvation, and the roads almost impassible; indeed, there were often no roads at all, the traveler being obliged to follow Indian paths or marked trees. There being no bridges of any sort across the streams, no causeways over the swamps, it was exceedingly toilsome and hazardous traveling through the country at any season. Mr. Lane, while traveling in this country, was often hungry, without being able to find bread, meat, or even milk. On one occasion, having fasted nearly the whole day, he called at a log cabin and asked the poor distressed-looking woman if she had any bread. The answer was no. Have you any milk? No, was the reply. Seeing a piece of dry, burned johnny cake crust as large as his two fingers on the window-sill, he begged that, and it was granted him. This he ate with a relish, and it sufficed him until the next day. His coat gave out, and he procured some coarse cloth and contrived to cut out and make a coat with his own hands, although no tailor. This he wore to Philadelphia to Conference, where a benevolent lady presented him with a new suit, which relieved him of much mortification, and fitted him for respectable society."

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MARY FRANCIS PENN died of consumption, at her father's residence in Fayette county, Texas, July 18th, 1859. She was born in Henry county, Va., May 29th, 1834. She embraced religion in early life, and joined the M. E. Church, from which time to that of her release from earth, she gave evidence of her spiritual birth. She endured great sufferings during her last illness; and, for, acerly sixteen months, was one of the most perfect examples of Christian fortitude, patience, and resignation I ever saw. She remarked, just previous to her death, that the past year had been the happiest one of her life. She read, and studied her Bible, marked many striking passages and gave it to a beloved sister, with the injunction to read it often; and, when she saw the pencil marks, to think of her happy sister. She was an affectionate and obedient daughter, a devoted sister, ardent in her attachments to her friends, and amiable in disposition; endowed with more than ordinary talents, and eminently qualified for usefulness in life. Her removal from earth ere her sun of life had reached its meridian is a most mysterious providence. A short time before her departure, she exclaimed "Farewell earth," "Hail heaven!" At another time, looking at her mother, she said, "Almost home!"

CAPT. JOHN McTYEIRE, in his sixty-seventh year, died near Uchee, Russell county, Alabama, 13th July. Long a citizen of Barnwell District, South Carolina. In the times of 1832-33 he commanded a company of nullifiers: hence the simple title which he bore. He was an intense State-rights man, and a Methodist. These two principles explain him: they were the simple pillars—the Jachin and Boaz—of his character. John Calhoun in State, and William Capers in Church, were his models, and he left a son named for each of them. He was the head of his wife, and commanded his children and his servants; and in turn was loved and reverenced by them. As Providence increased his substance, he increased his contributions to the Church. His pulse failing, one of his sons repeated in his ear suitable scripture; among others this—"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." And added—"Father, you are passing through it now: do you fear any evil?" The answer, firm and deliberate, was—"No uneasiness about the future—none—none at all." "Do you trust your soul to the mercy of God, depending alone upon what Jesus has done for you?" "I do, I do." And so a life of thousands of mercies was crowned with a peaceful end. During a long sickness he realized the truth of the text from which Rev. John Carter preached his funeral sermon—"Unless thy law had been my delights, I should then have perished in mine affliction."

HELLAND.

MISS LIZZIE McDANIEL, daughter of Mr. Henry and Mrs. Delilah McDaniel, of Summerville Alabama, died on the 10th ultime, after a sudden and short illness, at Calhoun Institute Macon, Mississippi, aged 17 years. Physically, mentally and morally Lizzie was the pride of her parents, teachers and friends. Her personal advantages were decided. Mentally, Miss McDaniel was highly endowed. Her natural capacities were pre-eminently good. The tone and sentiment of her mind were truly elevated. She had been for some years, a critical student of English literature, and hence, in conversation, was rich, and elegant, varied and accurate. Morally, her principles and practice were unexceptionable; her views correct, feelings kind and benevolent. For some months prior to her demise she had been earnestly and intelligently interested in spiritual matters. If the dying words of any can be taken as evidence of future happiness, then ought hers to be so taken; for they abounded in humility, faith and trust in the Savior. Lizzie had grace given her by a merciful God, to believe—she did believe. Of this her own sweet, truthful tongue gave ample proof. "By grace are ye saved through faith." Lizzie took her Maker at his word. By his aid she believed, and is now, thanks be unto the great and good God, reaping the fruit of this faith, in the company and coaverse of the blest.

JAMES HOWARD LYONS:

At a meeting of the Phaquemino Brulee Sabbath-school held July 24th, the following Preamble and Resolutions were offered by J. D. Cara, and adopted:

WHEREAS, God in his providence has removed from our midst, JAMES HOWARD LYONS, a member of our school:

Resolved, 1. That in him we have lost one of our most punctual and attentive members.

Resolved, 2. That we deeply lament his early death, but rejoice in the hope that he is now enjoying. "The rest that remains for the people of God."

Resolved, 3. That we acknowledge the hand of God in keeping us from a like premature death; and will, His grace assisting us, so improve the privileges and blessings which we now enjoy, that when death shall summon us away from this state of probation, we may be fully prepared to join "little Jimmy" in the oilmes of eternal felicity.

Resolved, 4. That we deeply sympathise with the bereaved father and his remaining little ones in their afflictions.

RAPHAEL LYONS, superintendent.

MRS. VIRGINIA A. OLIVER, wife of J. Berrien Oliver, and youngest daughter of the late Hon. Eli S. Shorter, died in Wynnton, near Columbus, Georgia, July 12, 1859. Her birth, marriage, death—the three great events of life—were all crowded into the short space of twenty-six brief years. She came into the world and stopped a little while—just long enough to show us how beautiful the existence of an angel is; and then, her lovely mission ended, she quietly folded her hands in death, and went meekly back again to her Father's home. The frail and tender little flower—too sweet, too pure, too delicate for earth—transplanted, blooms in heaven. And in that better world, my darling, we'll live and love again for evermore. Thither from all else we turn us now. From this dark and dreary world, from the present, with its cheerless blank, from the past, even with its precious, fragrant memories—from all we turn away—and looking only upward to the great future, with its hopes and sure rewards, we trustfully stretch out our arms to thee, dear Glunie, and melt our blest remains there.

HON. T. L. THOMPSON was born in Abbeville District, S. C. May 25th, 1825. He embraced religion and joined the M. E. Church, in 1847. He was admitted to the bar, in Kosciusko, Mississippi, in 1849. Though not a man of brilliant talents he stood very fair as a lawyer, and was highly respected in this relation by his fellow citizens. He was elected last fall to the State Senate unanimously, from the counties of Leak and Atalla. He gave entire satisfaction to his constituents. He had been class-leader and Superintendent of Sabbath-schools for many years. In these relations he was highly esteemed, and the Church and Sabbath-school in Kosciusko, Mississippi, have sustained serious loss by his death. No man was more highly appreciated in this community than he; and his death is universally regretted. He died, July 13th, leaving a wife, seven children, numerous relations and friends to mourn his loss.

JOHN ASBURY MITCHEL was born in Chattooga county, Ga., June 14th, 1840. When 8 years old, his parents came to Mississippi, and settled in Attala county. He was in many respects a model youth. He honored his father and mother. He was ever let in his love and adherence to truth. Kind and affectionate to his brothers and sisters. He professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, South, at Bethel camp-ground, in 1857. He was faithful after this in using the means of grace. His mother thinks he never went to bed without first going out into the grove to pray. He died at home, Attala county, Mississippi, of typhoid fever, June 30th. May his parents, brothers and sisters meet him in heaven.

L. ERCANBRACK.

Kosciusko, Miss., July 27th, 1859.

JAMES B. RICHARDSON was born in Sumter District, South Carolina, in the year of 1789, and emigrated to Wilkinson county, Mississippi, where he resided until July 25th, 1859, the time of his death, aged about 70. Save one brother, the deceased is the last, of father, mother, and many brothers and sisters, who have preceded him to the Spirit land. He leaves a widowed wife and many sons and daughters. For a series of years previous to his death, many were the sorrows of his numerous relatives caused by his mental infirmities; amidst which, having arrived at three-score and ten years, after a brief illness. He bid adieu to earth and its sorrows.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Cholera or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1855.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores near the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no pana-cea, nor Nostrum nor Patent Medicine, no Secret but no invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician. It very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov 26, 1856.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams' Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was affected with a cutaneous eruption which covered the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Vesey, Esq. of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Wasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to them in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following; published in my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Wasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity.

Respectully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription—I was unable to detect any impression occasion'd by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the horrible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast, of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and in running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to four years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore in nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affection of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Having this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine. I am truly yours, M. MCCORMICK.

We Dont Want Any Other.

Such is the language of all who use "WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE," when they call for that one any other is offered them; they have tried it, and from experience know it is no superior to all others; therefore when they are to want of a medicine of the kind, they purchase that which they know to be good and can be depended on. An Agent who called on us a few days ago, said "I find it difficult to sell any other Vermifuge when I have yours. I have had sales in my store for a long time which I occasionally try to 'work off,' but no one will purchase it unless I warrant it as good as yours, this I cannot do." So it is, and so it will be, Winer's Vermifuge owes its unrivalled popularity to its own intrinsic merits, on this alone it has a ways depended, nor were it not a fact that it is superior as a remedy for worms, it would ere this have shared the unenviable fate of many other artic

Strange contrasts of Population and Manners in San Antonio—Improvement—Trade—Chihuahua, New Mexico; Sonora—Mexican Mission School—Selling out for California—Castroville—Valley of the Medina—A Cross—Rio Frio—Uvalde—Preaching on the Outskirts of Civilization—A Frontier Methodist—Nueces River—Turkey Creek—A Charming Wilderness Home—Fort Clarke.

RESUMING in this letter the thread of my narrative, let us linger yet a little about San Antonio. The past and the present have met here, and abide in fellowship—the old and the new live side by side—different races, unlike in origin, government, education, religion, domestic habits and national destiny, constitute the population—neither materially affecting the other; each perpetuating the customs peculiar to them while separate. The Mexican, with his old ideas, plans and ways, all ancestral and superannuated, riding his donkey without a bridle, and peddling sticks and scraps for his daily bread; the inventive, headlong American, full of energy, his hopes always a-head of his business and his gains. The one, stagnant from the dullness of his nature and the misrule of his country—content to live without aspiration or change; the other, strained in every muscle and stretched to his full height—looking out for "the good time coming," and resolved to go and meet it if it does not come soon. In fine, this conjunction of "peoples" is odd, motley—curious to see and fruitful of reflection.

The same contrast is to be seen in the habitations. Here is the "jacal," pronounced "harkal," the lowest style of a house—poles set in the ground, tied with raw hide, and the spaces rudely daubed with mud, and the roof thatched with reeds or straw; next, the adobe, a sort of sun-dried brick—the most common material for building in all Mexico, that I have seen—these houses have small doors, narrow windows (often none at all), dirt-floors, and generally look to be anything but comfortable. Such buildings are fit only for a very dry country—a long wet spell would dissolve them. They are cheap, easy to build, and may be made agreeable residences.

Now, look again—there is a neat American cottage of modern fashion; yonder is a brick mansion that would look well at home, in any city, North or South; turn a corner, and see a stone structure three or four stories high, not far from the magnificent; here are shops and stores, shanties and palaces—mud, brick, and wood houses—high, low, great and small, oddly associated, strangely contrasted.

San Antonio is improving rapidly, trade increases, population comes in, and the Anglo-American rules. The inhabitants of Chihuahua, New Mexico and Sonora, trade here; the streets are full of teamsters, oxen and waggons; and, to the eastern ear, there is a Babel of dialects on the side-walks, at the counter, on the Plaza, and everywhere. The dust is terrible, the sun shines with tremendous power, but a delightful breeze comes every day, to fan, revive and cheer, both stranger and citizen.

An appointment was announced, and I preached at night to a fine congregation. My hopes are strong that, under Dr. Boring's ministrations, Methodism will attain to a controlling, saving influence in this growing city, and that their new Conference, the Rio Grande, will fulfil the expectations of the Church in its organization. In passing, I would suggest to the Board of Managers at Nashville, the propriety of establishing a mission for the Mexicans at San Antonio, and, especially, of founding a school for the children of that much and long neglected people. The basement of our church was intended for a school-room, and with very little expense may be fitted up conveniently. This is a salient point, and proper efforts will not only do local good, but will help us to extend the gospel into the several States of Mexico. Our true missionery field lies near us—we ought to occupy it—and San Antonio is the place to begin. I call the attention of the Church to this subject, and hope when I reach Goliad next November, to hold the first session of the New Mission Conference, to be furnished with men and means to begin a Mexican Mission at San Antonio, and to send a preacher to El Paso. So much at present, to all concerned—more hereafter in another form.

The time has come to leave. Mr. Giddings, the contractor, proposed to send myself and family and one of the preachers in an extra as far as Fort Clarke, one day in advance of the regular line, inasmuch as the stage would be crowded to that post. Moreover, it gave us the advantage of a night's rest upon the road, and would prepare us for the fatigue to come.

On the 20th May we set out, accompanied by the good wishes and openly expressed fears of numerous friends. With a fine team of horses, a careful driver, and a prairie road, we soon were miles away from the dust of the city—rejoicing in the open country and the playful winds of heaven.

The rolling plain is covered with mezquit bushes, rather than trees, yet furnishing fuel for the camp fires of the emigrant and the trader. Far away on the horizon we see mountain ranges, and presently we descend a long slope and then ascend; now the hills draw nigh, and yet the road allows undiminished speed, and so we proceed for twenty miles, to the village of Castroville, on the Medina river.

The pretty town is named after Mr. Castro, a Portuguese gentleman who founded a colony here, long years ago. The population is French, German and American—not many of either.

The hotel, where we stopped to dine, is kept by a Frenchman, who fairly maintains the reputation of his countrymen for politeness, and, withal, spreads a fair table for his patrons.

The valley of the Medina is fertile; but the farms give feeble promise of bread to the eater, in consequence of drought. If a man may judge from appearance, work was as scarce as rain. The mountain scenery is beautiful. On one of the summits there stands, very conspicuously, a cross. On inquiry, I learned that two Mexicans had been killed at that spot some years ago, and that the cross marked the place of their burial. This symbol of the Catholic religion is to be seen occasionally along the whole route. Thus seen, it is very significant. As far as I could learn, it in every case tells of violence, blood and murder—death, by Indian revenge or love of plunder—of Catholic superstition, here void of its offensiveness by its tender respect for the unfortunate. The grave and the cross—I cannot look upon them without thoughts of death—perhaps sudden, violent, and burial by strange hands on the lone wilds—a grave, without name or date, or one memorial of affection. Humanity, love, memory, hope, all shudder at such a prospect. But the cross—instrument of death, yet lever of power to lift the fallen, as it stands erect, pointing to heaven, tells of resurrection and life.

My thoughts ascend, and I glory in a faith which reveals an omnipresent God, and a Saviour who remembers the dust of his saints. The desert is as safe a depository for Christ's jewels, as the private garden, the country churchyard, or the city cemetery.

In the afternoon we crossed the channel where, in wet weather, the Rio Frio river runs, but now dry as the summer threshing-floor. Mountains—mountains on either side, naked mountains! But still we roll along on ridges and plains almost without a jolt, amid dead grass, drooping-bushes, and all the signs of a fearful drought. With showers in season, this might be a habitable and prosperous country; as it is, the settlements are few and far apart.

About 9 o'clock at night we drew up at a Dutch tavern, and found supper, beds and rest. In the morning one of our horses was foundered, and we were delayed a while in trying to relieve him. Compelled to drive the same team, we expected to make slow progress; nevertheless we reached Uvalde in time for a late dinner.

As the day was excessively warm, we determined to lie by till mid-night, and brave in darkness the perils of the way. The little town was rife with stories of Indians and their depredations. Some stragglers from a scouting party came in and told of "signs," and one man reported that his cow came up with an arrow sticking in her side, and prophets of evil and danger were thick and fluent. But I had already heard so much and seen so little, that I ceased from all apprehension, and travelled with a feeling of security as strong as I feel in the East.

At this place I met Bro. Horton, a young man whom I transferred from Georgia last Conference, and appointed to this outside circuit. I found him in fine health; pleased with his work; he is loved by the people, and likely to report a well-organized circuit at his Conference this Fall. I preached for him at night in the Court-house, and on coming out he told me, that in all my wanderings I had preached at last on the outskirts of civilization. From this point to Fort Clarke, it is fifty miles; and I think there are only two settlements—one at Turkeyville, twenty miles distant, and the other at Alum Spring, still twenty miles further. The last settler I found to be a Methodist, holding on to his religion and waiting for the gospel. I promised to embrace him and his family in the circuit next year. But I anticipate.

At midnight the regular stage overtook us, and we traveled together to the breakfast-house at Turkey creek. In the meantime, we crossed the Nueces, a large river on the maps, famous in the disputes of Texas and the United States as to the Western boundary of Texas; but, to my astonishment, not a drop of water in its rocky bed. During the long dry seasons common to this region the water sinks, and it is only here and there that man or beast can find "a hole" that still contains the precious element. The channel where we crossed is wide, the banks high, and there is room for a noble stream. The timber is thick, and forms the hiding-place of what the people call "varmints," such as bear, a species of leopard, and wild cats.

Turkey creek is a beautiful little stream, abounding in fish—with a clear gushing spring on its bank for the use of the only family which as yet has retreated from the haunts of men to find a home in this lonely solitude. With society, here is a pleasant place to live. The range of mountain and prairie for stock, plenty of live oak timber, never failing water—game in abundance—deer, turkey, bear, fish of various kinds, pure air and good health. I never saw so many wild turkeys in all my life as I saw in this place. The corral, (a cow-pen,) was full of cattle, an improved stock, and near the house—if erect poles, without a roof, may so be called—and the flies attracted by a plate of honey on the breakfast table, swarmed like bees and took possession of everything. I did not dispute title with them, but paid my fare and retreated, fasting.

After a hot ride of three hours over a poor, barren, rocky country, we reached Fort Clarke, and stopped to arrange for the onward trip. Of this, in my next letter.

DR. LEE ON THE "PULPIT."

His Critic—"A certain Mr. Ferguson of Tuskegee."—"On Grinding Axes" Again.—Query!

MR. EDITOR: A few days since a copy of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, date June 15th, fell into my hands; in which I see that a "certain Mr. Ferguson" of Alabama is "pouring forth" not very large shot into Dr. Lee's pulpit article of the April Quarterly, with the view, it seems, of not only demolishing the article per se, root and branch but of literally crucifying the Doctor himself on the lofty stilts of his self-conceit, by challenging his redoubtable champion (who, says he, "is on remarkably fine terms with his own ways, thoughts and deductions") to desist his cruel carnage among "the ashes of the venerable dead," and his terrible "invectives against Wesley and the buried generations of Methodist preachers," lest he, Mr. Ferguson, be compelled to thrust himself in "his way," and explode his vain imaginings "about preacher-making machines." (Will he tell us what sort of machine that is?)

He charges the Doctor with "long, loud, unfaltering fault-finding with Wesley and all his sons down to the present generation;" and, in fine, with setting himself up in opposition to the "God of Abraham, Paul and Wesley." The Doctor is further represented as "going cap begging of theological training-schools—from Romanists, Lutherans, Churchmen," etc., in opposition to the revealed will, I suppose, of Abraham and Paul's God—for what? "In order to make an idol for a few complaining, fastidious Methodists." Such things, and more of the like, he "pours forth" upon the unlucky head of Dr. Lee. And this, he is pleased to denominate, a "review of the good brother's production;" intended, he affirms, "to take the spell from off his mental vision, that he may see once more with the clear-sightedness of a Methodist preacher."

Behold! Doctor, what sublime visions await the restoration of your feeble and obscure sight when Mr. F. has succeeded in removing the scales of Roman superstition and idolatry that now confound your views on this topic, and in convincing you (alas! for thee,) that "ninety-five hundredths of the Methodist clergy, living or dead," including Paul and Wesley, differ entirely with you and a "few fastidious Methodists," touching either the importance and necessity of ministerial education, or the propriety and wisdom of providing suitable and adequate facilities for ministerial training! In short, Doctor, Mr. F. thinks that, Aaron-like, you have obtained your "jewels" of thought and logic from Romanists, Lutherans, etc., and having put them into the crucible heated by the fires of your burning "invectives against Wesley and all the venerable dead," you have, somehow or other, brought forth a "golden calf," with frightful theological horns which he proposes to demolish by his awful thunderbolts, nay, even Moses-like, to grind to very powder.

I would ask Mr. F. candidly and seriously, if he regards such sheer rodomontade as this, appropriate to what he calls a "fair fight," "a fair debate" on a question of such grave magnitude? Do you offer this as a "fair review" of Dr. Lee's article on the "pulpit?" Is it a "review" at all? Is it not, in truth, whatever you intended, an anachristianlike abuse and perversion of both the article itself and of the Doctor's relations to the whole question?

The Doctor neither scandalizes nor inveighs against Mr. Wesley nor his true sons in the ministry, as you affect to believe, unless you esteem yourself the imaginary target of his terrible thunders. Have you not scared yourself in this matter? Nor can any candid reader of the Doctor's article, I think, discover so much of the sinner in him, and iniquity in it, as you claim to have found. But you and Solomon agree in saying that "all the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes;" and, i may be added in your own language towards Dr. Lee, "whoever reads Mr. F.'s article cannot fail to see" (if he have Mr. F.'s discernment) "that he is on remarkably fine terms with his own ways, thoughts and deductions." That, perhaps, unriddles the riddle. Be it so. I regret it for all concerned, as otherwise the world might have been favored with the extraordinary discovery that, from the beginning, God had positively interdicted any such things as theological or biblical schools in the M. E. Church, South.

Unfortunately for Mr. F. the other two great branches of Methodism have had such schools in successful operation for many years. Did not Mr. Wesley advocate such schools from the beginning? Have not the Wesleyan Methodists had two such colleges for many years past? Have these all backslidden or apostatized from the faith of St. Paul? Will Mr. F. say this? Dare he say it? Who then slanders and inveighs against Mr. Wesley? Dr. Lee or Mr. F.? Those who represent Wesley and his compeers as advocates and patrons of ministerial schools, or Mr. F. who seeks to make the impression—either through want of information or of design—that Wesley and everybody else, save Dr. Lee and a few others, were opposed to such schools? Have they not similar schools in the M. E. Church, North? Were Wesley, Drs. Clarke, Benson, Bunting, Fletcher, Watson, Olin, Fiske, Coke and Asbury, in the same predicament with Dr. Lee? Verily, Mr. F., the Doctor has some excellent company, even among the "venerable dead." What shall I say of the living? According to Mr. F.'s arithmetic, "ninety-five hundredths of the living Methodist clergy" are against Dr. Lee. Really one can but suspect that Mr. F.'s vision was exceedingly obscure when he made that figuration, and through a slight mistake he estimated himself at fifty or seventy-five per cent. of the whole. Otherwise who can account for the wide discrepancy between Mr. F.'s figures and the facts in the case! You must try that problem again, Mr. F.

Moreover, Mr. F. discovers that "a certain Mr. Kennedy of East Tenn. has been pouring forth in the Nash. Advocate, numbers, to the amount of a half dozen or more, in which he proved to his own satisfaction that the Christian Church did begin in the third century to establish theological schools, and, that henceforth this was the order of things until the Reformation. And then the Protestants of every sect had them until the reformation. And his labored conclusion is, that the Methodists must have them two." Mr. Kennedy then succeeded, Mr. F., in proving something to your satisfaction, that is to say, that he is not as wise as you are, by at least "ninety-five hundreths;" and, hence, his satisfaction with the clearness, logical force and historical truthfulness of his arguments for biblical schools is "ninety-five" per cent. less than your satisfaction with your logical demolition of Dr. Lee's "pulpit" article.

You will allow me to say further, that until you shall have illuminated my darkness, and "taken off the spell from my mental vision," I can never believe otherwise on this subject. I am, Sir, sincere in my confessions. If I am in error, thou, who art a "master in Israel," can't teach me the right and true way. For, without egotism, I may claim for Dr. Lee and myself, perhaps, as loyal and true a devotion to Methodism and her interests as you or any other of the "ninety-five hundreths" can possibly do. And, we too, so love Methodism as sincerely to desire her improvement in every possible direction.

Finally, Mr. Ferguson, if you really desire to enlighten the world on this grave subject, and are ready for "an open field and fair fight," let us have your arguments, not fancies—your logic, not conjecture—your facts, not idle dreams—your true philosophy, not vain speculation—the true issues, not false and foreign ones—your love, not your hatred—your good-will, not your dark suspicions—and your mercy, not your vengeance. On these terms we are ready for the "fight," otherwise, we "will get out of your way."

And now, reader, get Dr. Lee's article, read, ponder it; and you will not only have his defense, but be richly repaid. Also, read Dr. M'Tyeire's essay on "Grinding Axes" again, and it will sharpen your discernment not a little. His text was, "If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength," Eccl. x. 10.

And if Mr. F. is not in the condition of a certain Dr's Paddy, who, having left the rail-car to go into a drinking-shop near at hand for refreshments, and running out catching sight of the rushing train he has just left, to "get a taste of the crather," cried out: "Hould on there, ye murtherin stame-wagin! Ye've got a passenger aboard that ye've left behind;" he will do us the favor of reading Solomon's proverb, and furnishing an exposition of the same in connection with this question, with no reference to theological schools; "Ought our Church to educate young men who give satisfactory proof of the call to preach the gospel, but whose insufficient education disqualifies them for the work of the ministry?

Strawberry Plains, Tenn. JAS. S. KENNEDY.

P. S.—I can assure Mr. F. that I entertain no ill-will towards him, but feel and believe that he has written in an unkind, unfair and unjust manner, concerning both Dr. Lee and myself, as is evidenced abundantly by the quotations from his article. I can assure him further that, if he wishes to discuss this question on its real merits (and it ought to be,) fairly and in a christian-like manner, I will never yield the palm to him or any other disputant in Christian courtesy and gentlemanly candor. REMINISCENCE.

Some interesting Items of Negro-life and Religion—Death of Uncle Tom in Church.

IN 18——it was my lot to be placed on the T—— circuit, where I made many acquaintances and had many warm Christian friends; and among the multitudes that I love to remember in that delightful field of labour, are several members of my colored charge—indeed, I have had few happier hours in this world than I enjoyed amongst the deeply pious, simple-hearted colored people of T——. I can see many of them now, in memory's eye, as they were many years gone by; there was John, with his large manly form, a sort of "Commander-in-chief," who seemed to command universal respect by virtue of his ample form and dignified bearing; but amongst the number of the deeply pious, was Uncle Plenty, a bountiful name, and he abounded in goodness; he was by common consent chorister, and O, how sweetly he could sing—I fancy I can almost hear him now, as the mellow tones of his soft sweet voice fell upon my delighted ear as he slowly rose and extended his hard hand, and commenced singing his favorite spiritual melody, "little children love one another, like the child of Bethlehem."

O, what scenes of rapture have I felt and seen there; but I took my pen for the purpose of telling you something about Uncle Tom. He was a sort of oracle amongst them all. When Uncle Tom spoke they all kept silence, and if need be, yielded opinions, and gave in to his superior judgment; and seemed perfectly at ease while they could say, "Uncle Tom says so, and he knows best."

Uncle Tom's influence however was not confined to the colored people, he was respected by everybody in the community who respected religion; and his influence was always extended in the proper time and in the right direction. In time of revival, when penitents were called for, Uncle Sam was always on hand, and always busy; and not unfrequently he would second the efforts of the officiating minister by a well-timed and forcible exhortation, generally directed to the young men, and if his penetrating eye detected the teary eye or trembling frame among his respectful auditors, which he often did, he then became personal; and many young men life has actually led to the altar, and when they knelt he would give vent to a hearty "thank God!" and implore the pardoning mercy of God upon them; and go in quest of others. Indeed, such was the confidence in and respect for Uncle Tom, that his presence and aid seemed to have become a sort of necessity in a revival in that community.

A gracious work broke out finally, however, when very few seemed to be looking for it. And Uncle Tom, living a few miles in the country, and being a little unwell, did not hear of the meeting until it had been in progress a week; as soon as he heard however, he was not long in being "on hand," and when he came, he seemed to take hold as if determined to make up for lost time. Saturday night and Sunday morning he was there, and made himself both heard and felt; indeed, he seemed quite carried away from earth. At the hour for preaching, the body of the Church being well filled, Uncle Tom was found in front of the gallery, which was built across the end of the house from the pulpit, and a wing on either side reaching within a few feet of where the preacher stood—the whole Church was in a mellow state, and preaching was a sweet, pleasant work that day. The preacher wound up his discourse, as usual, in the better land; and, as he spoke of the last moments on earth, and of the first glimpse of the heavenly messengers sent to escort the free spirit to the paradise of God, and as they took their upward flight, and the spirit first caught a view of the pearly gates of the new Jerusalem, about that time Uncle Tom seemed so completely filled that he could contain no longer, and raising each arm and embracing a brother on either side, he gave vent to one long pent up halleluyah. His head slowly reclined, and he was dead; 'twas long before any one would believe him dead. He had been so often seen before under similar appearances, all thought for a length of time "he will come to presently, and then we shall hear some of Uncle Tom's best shouting." But his spirit had left the clay, and he shouted in a louder, sweeter strain above.

I had not left the altar, full of penitents, when Bro. F. came to me, and asked with interest, "have you seen Uncle Tom?" "I said no." He said, "I believe he is dead." I said surely not; but went to see Dr. G., who was just preparing to make examination with a mirror, and pronounced him dead. He was carried to the residence of his young mistress, who lived hard by—shrouded, and laid upon his cooling-board.

After dinner I called in to see the corpse. I met his master at the door, and he said, with a sad face: "Well, Tom is dead, but he's gone to heaven. O, said he, if there ever was a good man, surely Tom was one." My attention was directed to a remarkable warmth about the region of the heart, which continued until he was buried next day. Of course I would rather risk my chance for heaven than that of any one else, but if I must change with any one, give me Uncle Tom as soon as any one else.

"YE HAVE NEED OF PATIENCE."

An Old Sermon on a New Subject, from One who Speaks from long Experience—The last Agony.

MR. EDITOR: I have lately had special use for the above text; and I have a great mind to preach you or rather your readers a short sermon from it.

We are in the habit of calling this a fast age—we say, generally, that men learn fast—that they live fast, that they die fast—and in a word, that everything in these days is done in a hurry. I own that we eat fast, and travel fast, and sin fast, and do most things in a hurry; but there are some departments into which steam and electricity have not entered. In the business of speech-making, for instance, men still drag their slow length along; hence, the force and importance of the text, "Ye have need of patience!"

Mr. Editor, did you ever attend one of our modern Commencements, where the order of the day is speaking, speaking, speaking—"line upon line, line upon line—here a little, and there a little?" If not, before you encounter that scene, I advise you to read carefully my text, and with it, that other parallel passage, found in James, which says "let patience have her perfect work." Why, sir, if I were not preaching upon patience, I should be tempted to get out of patience, just thinking upon what these eyes have seen, and these ears have heard, within the last few weeks.

Somewhere between the centre and circumference of this great State of Alabama, I happened to be present on one of these Commencement occasions, and, if you will believe me, sir, we went into service—yes, sir, regular service, at eight o'clock; and, after listening to about twenty essays from the young ladies—inaugural, salutatory, valedictory, etc.—many of them well-written, well-read, and none of them tedious and drawling—interspersed beautifully with music, instrumental and vocal; then came the last agony, in the form of a speech, essay or sermon—believe it was not decided which, but it was read, and the delivery took up two hours.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you will depict to your mind a crowded audience, the last of June—having already sat four or five hours—hungry, thirsty—having already had a perfect surfeit of literary dainties—the scene that followed can be better imagined than described.

But I will instance a few particulars as they impressed themselves upon my mind. As the speaker arose and laid down his manuscript before him, a kind of shudder seemed to pervade the whole audience—a sort of horror—such as came upon the spirit of Hamlet when he exclaimed, "Angels and ministers of grace, defend us." But the speaker proceeded, nothing daunted, and I confess I could but commend his courage, while I had so much fault to find with his discretion. The sight of the manuscript, and the thought of a two hour's seige, seemed to justify the audience in paying no attention to what was said, but rather to court their jeers and taunts for their own amusement while the infliction lasted.

"Just look there"—said an indignant miss, "if the man hasn't got a whole quire of paper to read." "Humph," replied her companion, "its a book, I'll have you to know; and you have got to sit there and hear it, every word."

A little way off a grave matron in suppressed tones commenced, "Well, I'll bet that man got his dinner before he came here to read that book." Another inquired of those around, "Can you tell me what that man is talking about?" "Really, I should call it a sermon but I did'nt hear the text."

And still another added, "Well I move, when these Trustees want another sermon preached, they send for a licensed preacher."

At this juncture I looked up, just in time to observe the effect upon a distinguished Doctor of Divinity, who, scratching his bald head, began in suppressed tones, "Well, if this isn't too bad. I'll tell you what I was thinking about," said he. "Really I must try hereafter to shorten my sermons."

"Good," said I; "truly it is a bad wind that blows nobody any good."

But I forbear, lest somebody may find the same fault in me, that I blame in others, and say, "Physician heal thyself." And now for the application, "Ye have need of patience." We must endure and suffer on, unless, Mr. Editor, you can do something for us. And I would suggest the difficulty could be reached in two ways.

First, Try to prevail on the proper authorities to arrange their programmes a little differently, and not attempt to crowd everything into one day.

Second, Suggest, to those having to make speeches, that it might be well to reserve something for a second chance; and, at any rate, if they must tell all they know at once, not to tell it over more than two or three times in the same speech.

JOE SMITH AND THE BIBLE.

I do not know how it may be with others, but with me, it is my greatest pleasure to take a retrospect of my past life, particularly my school-boy days. It was in one of those agreeable reminiscences that Joe Smith popped into my mind. I must beg leave to introduce Joe to your readers. Joe was an excellent good fellow. Every body loved Joe. We were class-mates. Joe was not remarkable for talents. He never could learn the dead languages.

One fine Monday morning, in the month of May, Horace's Ode, "De excidio Troiæ," was our lesson for recitation. Joe blazed away in great snuff, "malo avi ducos domum: you drew the house with the jaw-bone of your grandfather."

Birch folded his arms slowly, and with up-turned eyes, turned his back on Joe. After a pause of a minute, "Try again Mr. Smith," said he.

JOE.—"Ducis, you carried; mala, the apples; avi, of your grandfather; domum, home; you carried the apples of your grandfather home."

"Try again Mr. Smith."

JOE.—"You carried the apples to the house of your grandfather." The class roared.

Joe had to submit to the discipline of the School, which was to stand in the middle of the floor, for an hour, with a fool's cap on his head; and to be kept in at play-time, in order to get his lesson. Well, Joe got his Dictionary and Grammar. He would conjugate the verb, fix the mood, tense, and person; and declined, as he thought, the substantives according to their proper gender and declension, etc., but always with the above results. I hinted to Joe that perhaps he misunderstood the author. No, not he, he had made it out clear, by the Dictionary and Grammer. I told him Horace stood very high as a poet and wit; but that he made him write nonsense; couldn't help it, said he. The truth must come. I don't believe, said Joe, there ever was such a man as Horace; and if there was, he was no poet. And besides the Latin language has been a dead language for nearly two thousand years, and so nobody can understand it, nowadays.

In process of time we both quit school, and came South. Joe turned his attention to "Science," pale-faced science as he fondly called her; and to the Bible. Of course, the Bible shared in his hands, the same fate with Horace. By entirely misunderstanding every chapter, book and verse in the Bible, Joe lost no time in coming to the conclusion, that all nations, people, kindred and tongues, from the creation of the world down to his day—except himself and three and four others of his ilk—had been deceived, by what he was pleased to term, a "misguided philanthropy," and a "misguided theology." Joe becomes all at once, nobody knows how, a profound linguist, deeply skilled in Greek and Hebrew. The Septuagint version of the Bible, he pronounces, "was in itself very far from being accurate." And as for King James's Bible, he says, it was made a little less than two centuries ago, when there was little Hebrew learning in England. According to Mr. Smith, the fifty-four learned Divines of Westminister and the two Universities, (one of whom, Bishop Andrews, was said to be acquainted with fifteen languages, and was moreover a most excellent divine,) were incompetent to translate Hebrew. Mr. Smith pronounces the Jewish writers of the several books composing the Old Testament, as ignorant of Geography, Astronomy, Geology, Natural History and the Geographical distribution of animals and plants, and were therefore incompetent to give "an ethnographic chart of the whole world." Mr. Smith, entirely mistaken and misunderstanding the design of the Bible, if he ever read it, looks for things which should not be there, and overlooks things which are plainly taught therein.

For instance, Mr. Smith says: "There is nothing said in the Pentateuch about a future existence, or future rewards and punishments, and therefore, there could be little need for allusion to a common origin of man." Well, Mr. Smith has passed judgment on the Jewish writers of the books of the Old Testament, and on the fifty-four divines that translated King James's Bible, and has made the important discovery that the patriarches, from Adam to the deluge, "represent nations and not individuals;" that is, that Cain, Abel, Enoch, Irad, Mehujael, Methusael, Lamech, Jabal, Tubalcain, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalalel, Jarad, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech and Noah, were not individuals, but were so many separate, distinct, and independent nations, which did not have a common origin from Adam and Eve. This is Mr. Smith's "Plurality of Races." There is no difference between Mr. Smith and myself as to the genuineness and authenticity of the Pentateuch. It is only a matter of "construction," upon which we differ. If Mr. Smith's construction be right, then God did not create the heavens and the earth and all things therein in six days; but all the patriarchs, from Adam to the deluge, were created subsequently to the six days.

But Mr. Smith waxes more learned and interesting as we proceed. Says he, "but the point to which we wish to call more especial attention, is a false translation of the New Testament, which strikes at the very root of the controversy. Strange, however, as the assertion may seem, but a single verse in the whole New Testament bearing on the unity of the human family; and this verse in our version contains an interpolation which is intended to force an assumed construction upon it. I allude to the one so often quoted from Acts, xvii. 26: "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth; etc."

What does Mr. Smith say of our Savior? In the 19th Chapter of St. Mathew, third and fourth verses, we have his words for the unity of the human race. "The Pharisees also came unto him, tempting him, and saying unto him: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? and he answered and said unto them: Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said etc." These are the words, as they are rendered in King James's Bible, which Mr. Smith says is very faulty. Therefore he will not object, I hope, to my giving Dr McKnight's correction in this place. He says, it should read thus: He which made at the beginning made "male and female." The Pharisees had Moses and the Prophets. Have ye not read? Where? Why in 2d. Genesis and Malachi ii. 15, that he which made at the beginning made a male and female. So we see that Mr. Smith is much at fault. I might refer Mr. Smith to Rom. v. 12. and I Cor. xv. 22, as further allusions to the unity of the human race. Vide Mobile Weekly Register, September 22d, 1855, for Mr. Smith's Bible, Ethnology, etc. SCRUTATOR.

FORTY THOUSAND PEOPLE AT A PRAYER-MEETING.

THE Edinburgh Witness gives the subjoined account of a very remarkable prayer-meeting, probably the largest ever held since the dawn of the Christian era. We presume that the numbers are somewhat exaggerated, as other papers do not place them higher than from twenty to thirty thousand.

"A great union prayer-meeting, in connection with the present remarkable movement, was held in the open air in Belfast, Ireland, on Wednesday forenoon at half-past eleven o'clock. In order to accommodate all parties, the use of the spacious grounds of the Royal Botanic Gardens was obtained for holding the meeting; and as it was well known that many persons from the surrounding country were desirous to be present, special trains of uncommon length were run by the different railway companies. Some idea of the interest felt may be imagined when we state that it is computed that no fewer than fifteen thousand individuals arrived in Belfast, and that from thirty-five to forty thousand persons in all were present at the services. The leading streets of the town presented, during midday, a most remarkable aspect, particularly after the arrival of trains. The footways were literally thronged with well-dressed and respectable looking people from the country—neat passing along with the negligent and easy-going air of pleasure-seeking excursionists, but staid and solemn in demeanor—the younger as well as the elder; and the majority with Bibles or hymn-books in their hands, as if proceeding to Sabbath services. On they passed towards the place of meeting, passed the glittering rows of gorgeous shops, and through the fashionable thoroughfares. Thus the living stream—such a stream as was never before witnessed in Belfast—poured onwards for at least two hours, along both sides of the streets.

"The scene in the garden grounds is said by the Banner of Ulster to have been one of the most striking, as well as impressive and animating, ever witnessed in the province. The whole space within view from any point was as closely packed as it was well possible for it to be. Even the branches of the trees were taken advantage of by numbers of the junior members of the audience, as the most suitable situations for seeing and hearing; and there, while the sounds of praise were rising from the multitude below, these young worshippers were heard joining in the song of thanksgiving. Nothing of holiday levity—nothing of the thoughtless mirth of youth—was manifest among these; their attention was as marked, and their conduct as well ordered, as that of any person in the vast assemblage. Both as regarded its magnitude, and the deep solemnity and earnest spirit that pervaded it, the meeting is said to have recalled vividly the historic days and scenes of the signing of the 'Solemn League and Covenent.'

"The Rev. John Johnson of Tullilish, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church, presided, and he was supported by the ministers of the different Protestant denominations in and around Belfast. After prayer, the Chairman read a chapter from the Holy Scriptures, and then gave out the 100th Psalm; and never before in Belfast did so many voices unite in such hearty accord in singing this favorite song of Zion. Scarcely had the first note been raised on the platform, when it was caught up by the immense assemblage, the majority of the voices combining in surprising and unexpected harmony; and, as each stanza closed, the dying away of the cadence in the far distance of the throng, had an effect at once solemn and thrilling. Short addresses were delivered by ministers and converts; and, also by Mr. William Dickinson of Edinburgh, and Mr. Peter Drummond of Sterling. Prayers were also offered up, and verses from hymns sung. As it was impossible for the speakers on the central platform to make themselves heard by the whole of the vast multitude, clergymen and others scattered themselves among them, each forming the centre of a large congregation which immediately gathered around, joining in devotional exercises.

"At one time there were no less than twenty of these subordinate meetings, numbering from five hundred to one thousand each. Every here and there throughout the immense multitude, while the hymn or the prayer was rising on high, persons were being struck down under a sense of deep and overpowering conviction of sin. Inside of some of these circles there could not have been fewer than twenty persons—chiefly females—apparently under the influence of spiritual visitation, at the same moment; some of them prostrate upon the sward, and others reclining upon the laps of friends. These were affected in various ways—one weeping bitterly, but silently, under a deep conviction of sin; some crying piteously for mercy; and others unable to utter a word, so thoroughly were their physical faculties in abeyance. In many parts of the garden groups of boys and girls, who had retired from the body of the congregation, formed in the shrubbery little meetings for prayer and exhortation among themselves. Some of these were ragged little boys, who evidently belonged to the outcast classes. One of these cases was that of a little boy, about eleven years old, who, in a very retired part of the garden, engaged in prayer, surrounded by about twenty lads of the same age and class. This lad was, it appears, neglected by his parents, and formerly obtained a scanty livelihood by hawking ballads through the streets; and the tattered garments in which he as well as his companions were arrayed on Wednesday showed that, in that respect, their prospects in life had not much improved."

"At the close of the general meeting, one of the ministers of the town, who has moved a great deal among the juvenile population, was surrounded by a large assemblage of boys, who ultimately formed themselves into a procession, and marched into town, singing:

'O! that will be joyful.'

Many of these children evidently belonged to the lowest classes of society. A portion of the procession, which divided from the rest, on arriving at the Pound district, ceased to sing till they had passed its dangerous precincts, and resumed their song when they passed into Townsend street. The immense concourse of people left the gardens in the most orderly manner—the majority of them evidently impressed with the conviction that it was 'good for them to have been there.' A few manufactories and other places of business were closed for the day, in order to allow the workers to join in the above services."

IMPORTANT FIGURES.

THE whole North American continent has only 36,000,000 of inhabitants, hardly as much as France or Austria. The whole of Central America has only 23,000,000, which is less than Italy. European Russia, with its 60,000,000, has as many inhabitants as America, Austria, and Polynesia together. More people live in London than in all Australia and Polynesia. China proper has more inhabitants than America, Australia and Africa put together; and India has nearly three times as many inhabitants as the whole of the New World. The result is, that our planet bears 1,288,000,000 of human beings, of which sum total 522,000,000 belong to the Mongolian, 269,000,000 to the Caucasian, 200,000,000 to the Malayan, 196,000,000 to the Ethiopian, and 1,000,000 to the American race. Divided according to their confessions, there are 335,000,000 of Christians, 5,000,000 of Jews, 600,000,000 belonging to Asiatic religions, 160,000,000 to Mahommedanism 200,000,000 of heathen.

NEW ORLEANS:

[illegible]DAY.. AUGUST 27, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

With the volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should [illegible] to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper to the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

METHODISM OUTSIDE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH.

"Forty Thousand People at a Prayer-Meeting"—is the caption of a thrilling account, on our outside, of one incident of the great revival now prevailing in Ireland. Methodism—for all these modern revivals are offshoots from the revival under Wesley and Whitefield—is beginning to prevail throughout Christendom—in all the Churches—and is inspiring the whole religious literature of the time. "He preaches just like a Methodist," is the highest commendation given by many people of the sister Churches to many of their evangelical and useful pastors. The present movement for free seats, congregational singing, and extemporaneous preaching, now pervading the different Churches, had the same origin. The evangelists sent out by different denominations were suggested by our Itinerancy. By the way, we should have used the word "evangelist," instead of "itinerant," because it is both scriptural and appropriate. Lay-preaching had its origin in the exhortations and labors of our class-leaders, and other layman at love feasts, revival and camp-meetings. And street-preaching, and preaching in large places for the masses, had their origin in camp-meetings, protracted-meetings, and other practices always common to the Methodists.

But the greatest blessing Methodism has conferred, outside of her own pale, is the diffusion of that earnest zeal for the conversion of the people which gives power to the preaching of the gospel, and leads to what are called revivals, awakening and inspiring whole sections of country at a time. Let us thank God that these things are so.

Methodism has a much more comprehensive mission than the mere maintenance and advancement of her own ecclesiastical organization. To spread scriptural holiness over the world, is her mission, and ecclesiastical organization is only instrumental to the accomplishment of this end. According to the philosophy of Methodism, that ecclesiastical economy which is most effective, is the best. Many people who speak against our economy would modify their sentiments and their language if they looked at it from the point of view from which we look at it. It is not stereotyped. It is not an ecclesiastical system, so much as an organized spirit—the spirit of [illegible]. Whatever may be its changes, it will always be, if it remain true to itself, the best organization, in the judgment of its wisest and best men, for the spread of scriptural holiness among all classes of people, all over the world. It is not a manufactured piece of furniture, but "a tree planted by the rivers of water."

True Methodists are no partisans—no mere sectarians. The preaching of the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, the awakening of the hearts and consciences of the people, the edification, sanctification, and inspiration of the Churches, and the conversion of the world—these constitute the grand aims of Methodism. For the accomplishment of these aims, she labors for the perfection of beauty and power in her own organization. But her heart sympathizes fully with every manifestation of a similar zeal for the glory of Christ and the salvation of the world, in whatsoever Church it may be found. She sympathizes, because the inspiration is identical with her own, and because she has been largely instrumental in the kindling of this inspiration in all the Churches. She does not boast of this, for she has nothing but what she received from God and the other Churches, also, have been instruments of large benefit and profit to her. Many zealous and useful men, in all the Churches, who have but little sympathy with Methodism, and have never a kind word for her, have derived that spiritual philosophy and momentum which gives them their greatest success, from Methodistic associations, influences and teachings.

Methodists, could they always live in the light and be inspired with the spirit of their evangelical mission, should never retain railing for railing to their brethren of other denominations. For that mission comprehends the revival of the Churches and the sanctification of all Christians as well as the conversion of the world. Even Roman Catholic Bishops and priests, in this country, under the influence which Methodism has set in motion, are beginning to strive to break down among their members the immoralities of the drinking-saloon, the race-course, the gaming-table, the ball-room, and the theatre. Brother Methodist, live for the Holy Catholic Church of Christ, and for a redeemed world, as well as for the Methodist Church. But live for the former two, through the latter.

DR. M'TYEIRE'S SPEECH IN NEW YORK.

At the late Anniversary of the American Bible Society held in the city of New York, our brother of the Nashville Advocate, offered the following Resolution:

"Resolved, That the increasing demand for the Holy Bible makes it necessary, that the funds of the American Bible Society should be increased to enable the Society to meet this demand."

This Resolution was supported by an admirable speech from Dr. M'Tyeire. The main object of the speech was to show, that the Bible is essential in a course of education—essential, intellectually as well as morally—essential, as a classic no less than as a supreme moral and religious standard. Man cannot be cultivated properly in Science, Art and Literature, without having a knowledge of God's word; and the Doctor very strikingly presents the fact, that Antiquarians, Artists and all Scholars, must familiarize themselves with its teachings before they can be fit for their pursuits. Furthermore, he elaborates the idea, that a man must be utterly perplexed in his own literary if he is ignorant of the Bible. Every great work contains allusions and references to the inspired volume with which he must be acquainted if he can read on any topic to advantage. Religion is intellectually blended with all knowledge; and, if its wisdom be ignored, the mind must not only sink down into [illegible] spiritual darkness, but, by necessity, the faculties of understanding, imagination and taste, must suffer.

These views are very forcibly put. The style of the address is speech-like throughout—full of vigorous Anglo-Saxon—earnest and pungent—conscious of an aim, and resolute to reach it.

We are glad to see [illegible] sentiments. And [illegible] us, our pleasure that one of our own men, whose character, talents and position fitted him for the task, should have urged them on the attention of such an intelligent and influential body of Christians, as the Anniversary of the Bible Society never fails to gather together. The sentiments are true and just; moreover, they are precisely the sentiments now needed to be infused into the "curriculum of education." God's world cannot be understood without God's word—this ought to be our maxim; and whether physical science investigate its forms, arrangements and laws—or political science consider its economic relations—or moral science study its principle and duties, the Bible is absolutely essential, both to truth itself and to the applications of truth to its highest ends.

We cannot admit, for our part, that this great question is a matter of theory. We cannot admit, that it ought to be discussed primarily as we would discuss the propriety of introducing Geology or Physiology into an educational course. Altogether proper is it to treat it in this point of view, as an incidental and expedient interest; but the real question at issue lies below all such considerations. It is folly to build on a dust-pile when we can build on granite, and assuredly, where man's moral and eternal being is as much involved as it is in education, we ought to plant ourselves at once on the doctrine of man's spiritual relations, and insist that they be recognized.

Now, to recognize the Bible as a general authority and not teach it in due form, is simply an absurdity. Practically, it is no authority at all if it is set aside in a course of study to make room for the earthliness of science and literature. Practically, it is no power if it is not the first and supreme power. Practically, it is nothing if it is not everything.

We ought then at once and bravely to take the position, that the Bible is no authority where it is not regularly, thoroughly, effectively taught. A polite homage to it, as a book to be read at morning-prayer in an institution of learning, is not enough. A formal and conventional respect may do as between man and man, but where the heart is concerned, where the soul's life is at issue, where God is to be pleased or offended, it is almost semi-mockery to treat the Bible as if we were only amenable to the proprieties of good manners. Much of teaching is directly moral, because it involves moral subjects—all of it is more or less moral; and hence, on all topics and particularly on moral topics, if our teaching is not distinctly and emphatically Christian, it is not merely unchristian, it is worse—it is practically anti-christian; because it leaves the mind and heart open to those influences in literature and science that inevitably tend to estrange them from God and harden them in sin. If we have Christianity taught, we must have the Bible taught—taught systematically and zealously. We must give it the first and paramount place in Text-books. It must stand for God—sovereignty over intellect—over books—over everything—and in this majestic attitude be honored, reverenced and loved.

COMMENCEMENT AT CENTENARY COLLEGE.

By a "forced march," from Monday morning, Aug. 18, until the next Sunday morning, Aug. 24, we reached Centenary College of Louisiana within an hour of the time appointed for the Commencement Sermon, which we were engaged to preach. In the commodious and magnificent College Chapel—the finest we have ever seen—a large congregation was assembled, to whom we discoursed on the same subject as at La Grange, Ga; and, when done, felt relieved to think that labors of that kind were over for the season.

The audiences at the Commencement, throughout the five days' exercises, were composed of as intelligent and refined looking people as we recollect to have met. We have never seen a finer representation of the society of the negro, and cotton, and sugar region—a society unsurpassed in the United States wherever the country is old enough for its social culture to be developed. We never witnessed more uniform beauty among ladies. The great advantage of Centenary is, that she is centrally located in the very heart of the wealth and refinement of the fertile and prosperous region of which New Orleans is the centre. This crown no one may take from her. We were gratified to find that the College buildings corresponded, in architectural elegance, beauty, and spaciousness, with the wealth of the country and the taste of the people.

Nothing is needed to make Centenary equal, now and prospectively, to any similar institution in the country, but an ample endowment. Why it is that there is not more zeal on this subject, it is difficult to imagine. With the advantages in this fine institution, possessed by Mississippi and Louisiana, that they should do but little in this way, while Alabama endows two colleges, is surprising, and somewhat humiliating. Something is being done, however, and much is expected.

Centenary has an excellent Joint Board of Trustees and Visitors, most of them of long experience in her service, and all deeply interested in her welfare. They seemed determined, at the last session, to see to the endowment. She has, too, an able Faculty. President Miller, long in her service, as Professor and President, is a most excellent manager, and faithful instructor—skilled in finances—sagacious in policy—and having the esteem of Trustees, patrons, and pupils. His "Baccalaureate" was mature and elegant. Professor Holcombe, formerly Professor of Greek, now of Natural Science, is known throughout the South-west as an able teacher and excellent man. Professor Scales, in Mathematics, deservedly enjoys a high reputation. His Address before the Alumni Association was able, discriminating, and tasteful, and gave great satisfaction. Rev. J. J. Wheat, of the Mississippi Conference, was unanimously elected Professor of Greek—a selection which meets general approbation. Rev. Mr. Sundstrom was elected to the Chair of Modern Languages. He has a fine reputation as a man and as a teacher. Professor Wiley, brother of Rev. Dr. Wiley, President of Emory and Henry College, in Latin Language and Literature, is every way qualified for his post, and gives high satisfaction. Rev. A. G. Miller has been very successful in the conduct of the Preparatory Department. And so of Messrs. Nosworthy, tutor, and Crerar, Professor of vocal and instrumental Music.

The Address before the Societies was delivered by Rev. A. S. Andrews, of Mobile. It was full of noble thought and genuine eloquence. Mr. Andrews has high qualities as a thinker and speaker. All the exhibitions, including those of the Preparatory Department, the Societies, and the Graduating Class, were full of encouragement and satisfaction.

The Honorary Degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Rev. William H. Watkins, of Mississippi, and Rev. William Murrah, of Alabama. That of A. M. was conferred upon Rev. A. S. Andrews, and several others.

It is believed that the next session will open with an unusually large number of students—over two hundred and fifty.

LETTER FROM TUSKEGEE.

Mr. Editor.—Your paper comes to us regularly, and is full of interesting matter—edifying and comforting the Church. We desire very much to extend its circulation, and hope as the Camp-Meeting season comes on and passes away, that the preachers will avail themselves of so favorable an opportunity to secure new subscribers and collect old dues.

Every old and every new member of our Church should read at least one of our Church papers, and where can they do better than by subscribing for the New Orleans Christian Advocate?

If we examine it on its own merits, it is equal to any of our denominational publications, as a weekly paper; and, then it is the Official Organ of the Alabama Conference. At our last session it was adopted as such without a dissenting vote.

As a centre of religious information and influence in the Southwest, we ought to join together in its support and wide circulation—never ceasing our efforts until it finds its way into every family.

The rain in this section is almost daily, and if it continues the cotton crop will be greatly damaged by overgrowth. Corn will be plentiful—the hungry will have bread and the sower seed to sow.

Our people enjoy health, as well as prosperity in other things. Our Colleges are closed, and on that account our town is rather dull at present.

I hope you and family will escape the epidemic should your city be visited by it the ensuing Fall.

S. ARMSTRONG.

SOUTHERN METHODISM IN CALIFORNIA.

It is probably recollected that, from the first proposition to merge our interest in California into a Western Methodist Church, we have opposed it, and steadily contended for the maintenance of our own organization there. We have felt grieved that some good brethren continue to argue against maintaining our organization on the Pacific, or anywhere else, outside of slave territory. There is not, this day, a more fallacious, unjust, and dangerous philosophy in the bosom of the Southern Methodist Church than that which seeks, contrary to the whole spirit of her history, to circumscribe her operations within the limits of slave territory. Let that philosophy prevail, and we hesitate not to say that the integrity and unity of the Church is gone forever. We warn brethren of this rock in time. The Church, as such, has no reference—and can have none—to geographical and political questions.

Below we copy from the Nashville Advocate part of a letter from Rev. M. Evans, which we endorse to the letter. We advanced the same views to Bishop Pierce, in opposition to those implied in the quotation from his letter. The maintenance of our Pacific organization is not an open question—it never has been. It must go on, or die. We cannot and will not vitiate the Scriptural position of our Church, for any supposed advantages in a Western organization. Mr. Evans says:

I copy the following from the New Orleans Advocate of May 18, being an extract from Bishop Pierce's first letter, entitled, "Footprints Across the Continent," and dated April 30: "The collections have been liberal, all things considered; and in relation both to men and means, I think the Eastern Conferences inclined to sympathy and action, and that they will co-operate cheerfully, if assured that our organization in California ought to be maintained. In due time I shall give the Church my impressions on this subject." Now, Mr. Editor, I assure you that paragraph will be read with astonishment and mortification by all of our preachers and friends, and probably quoted with jubilant zest by the California Advocate. That the propriety of our stay in this country should now, by our Bishop, be proposed as a mooted question, is to us a caustic suggestion indeed. What have we done to merit this? Twice Bishop Soule has been with us and traversed our Conference bounds. Bishops Andrew and Kavanaugh, by protracted stay and familiar intercourse with all classes of our population, have posted themselves and reported to the home Churches. Our yearly record of success has regularly been sent up, and after eight years of severe toil and demonstrated success, the General Conference, with that large-hearted generosity which ought always to be found in the Christian character, has furnished us with the means of operating to advantage, when we are suddenly waked up to the consideration that the whole thing is an undetermined experiment.

As to the effect of Bishop Pierce's "impressions," I am disposed to suggest, in the language of Abraham, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." If the "Eastern Conferences" do not yet believe, I fear they are beyond the hope of ordinary conviction.

HEALTH OF NEW ORLEANS.

There is not, and there has not been, any yellow fever in the city this season. It is unusually healthy. We have never known a healthier place than New Orleans, except when visited by epidemic yellow fever, and we have lived in nearly all latitudes and longitudes South of Tennessee, and West of Georgia. Once acclimated by having a bona fide attack of genuine yellow fever, and the chances are as good for health and long life in New Orleans as in any other place in the Union. A second attack need not be feared, though any number of persons may be found who will declare that they have had it more than once. And yellow fever acclimation is a quasi acclimation against other fevers, especially, and against ollmatic diseases, generally.

The terror attaching to yellow fever grows principally out of its epidemic character. Thousands attacked with it at once, a panic is necessarily created. But congestive and typhoid fevers would be equally fatal were they epidemic in large cities. It must be admitted, however, that yellow fever is nearly always fatal, except treated by physicians and nurses thoroughly acquainted with it. It allows of neither delay nor mistake. That is the great danger. Many a victim has passed the golden moment for medical treatment before he is aware of the nature of his sickness.

And then to fall into the hands of any but a thoroughly experienced yellow fever physician is almost certain death. The same strong common sense and keen observation that give success to the simple medications of motherly old women in the back-woods country, are necessary for a physician, and especially in yellow fever. It is cured by guerrilla attacks upon the symptoms as they appear, and not by a general system of scientific strategy. In choosing a physician, in view of probable yellow fever, take the one who cures. Take pains to determine this.

We have said there had been no yellow fever in the city this season. Two cases were reported, but, upon examination by the Board of Health, the report is not confirmed. The truth is, no physician, of proper dignity and standing in his profession, will take it upon himself, without anvilling himself of the judgment of his professional brethren, to make so important an announcement as that there is yellow fever in the city. Whenever a physician does so, it is prima facie evidence that he is unreliable.

Whenever it is clearly ascertained that there is yellow fever in the city, it ought to be made known at once, and the New Orleans Christian Advocate never fails to make the announcement. But for some unnoted person, because he is called a "doctor," to alarm thousands of citizens and their families, and their friends scattered through the country, and imperil so many and so important interests as are involved, is not to be tolerated. In fact, no such announcement should ever go forth except through the Board of Health.

We rejoice to say that the city is unusually healthy, and physicians have little or nothing to do. Whether or not it will remain so cannot be decided. In New Orleans in the Summer, the presence of yellow fever is the rule, and its absence the exception. And there is yet ample time for an epidemic before the season closes. Let us hope, however, that we shall be spared this time.

Meanwhile, the city is no more sickly than usual, and yet there is neither yellow fever, nor fever of any kind, worth naming. Theories on the subject are worth nothing. The cause of yellow fever is still shrouded in mystery. The doctrine so common in the interior, that it is a high grade of bilious fever, has neither proof nor analogy. It is common for yellow fever to prevail when the season is delightful and the South winds as pleasant as breezes from Araby. Again, in the midst of a torrid season, and filthy streets, and after heavy inundations in the country, yellow fever does not make its appearance.

Greensboro' High School, Greensboro', Ala., advertised in the fifth column, third page, of this paper, is conducted by Rev. Dr. J. W. N. Means, a teacher of large and long experience, and first rate acquirements. The society is refined, the community moral, the school is furnished in the best style, and in a flourishing condition, as we learn. The Principal has the boys under his immediate control.

DISPUTED ADVOCATE ACCOUNTS.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate has not been conducted on the cash system. Hence, a great many of the accounts having grown large, we have, within the last few weeks, been sending them out to the subscribers, with directions to remit, or pay to the preacher. We had sent them to the preachers, early in the year, whenever they had sent us lists of the postoffices in their charges. The result has been a very prompt and satisfactory paying up on the part of many. In other cases, there have been disputes, and sometimes wrath and hard words—some of the latter two from quarters whence they were not expected.

These disputes and vexations grow out of long credit in general, and several other things in particular. The long credit is the root of all, however, and we are now digging it up, and do not intend to leave a fibre of that "root of bitterness," lest, "springing up, it trouble" us "and thereby many be defiled"—as they always are when they say bad words.

Let our dear friends remember that these things had to be settled, soon or later, and that it is better for the editor to have the complaints all in one large allopathic dose, than to be taking it homeopathically all the time. Then, brethren, help us to set this matter straight, instead of scolding us. Any amount of explanation we can bear, even if it put us in the wrong (unintentionally, on our part, always); but bitter words—well, if Methodist preachers can afford to write them, we cannot help it.

In addition, many other things are to be considered. First of all, we sometimes fall into an error, through oversight, miscalculation, misunderstanding, or something else. We are not infallible.

But we never wrong any body intentionally, and we correct every error as soon as we find it out.

Again, many persons honestly think they have paid us when they have not. Again, subscribers pay preachers, and they forget to either remit or pay at Conference. Again, a subscriber pays two dollars to a preacher towards the close of his subscription year, which is out by the time it reaches us. Thus, he ought to have sent five dollars—three for the past year, and two for the current year; and thus, when he sees his account long afterwards, it is much larger than he had supposed.

There is no remedy for these things but in having old accounts all settled up. Then we shall take pains to let every subscriber know when his year is nearly out, and prevent all this confusion. Brethren, friends, help us through this trouble, and that will be the end of it. We shall then follow the system explained in a standing notice under the editorial head.

Whenever you find an account wrong, or think it wrong, write to us, in good temper, explain fully, and you will always find us in good temper, and ready to do right.

Remember that, after all, we are more wronged than any body else. We lose thousands upon thousands of dollars, and never say one bitter word about it.

We keep our books in the best manner possible in such a detail business, with so many causes of mistake over which we have no control. Do not scold us for what may be the fault of other people, scattered all over the country.

Let every subscriber, when he receives his account, get a new subscriber, and if he is fretted, let him get two.

After all, the money comes in, and new subscribers too. Thanks for these things. Send them along. All will be right yet.

Remember: if the Agents keep a correct statement of the business they do for the Advocate, our books and theirs will not differ much.

THE COMING CONFERENCES.

Next month, says the Nashville Advocate, the annual round begins. The Bishops are packing up their valises for the journey, and the good people, where each Conference is to be held, are fixing up their Churches—painting them, etc., for the reception.

The Presiding Elders are on their last rounds: may they bring up many able-bodied, able-minded, and well-spirited young men, to be admitted on trial in the traveling ministry.

Pastors will soon be taking leave of their flocks. Let us ask, "Do you leave them better or worse? Has the Church merely held its own, or improved in spirituality and in numbers, under your care.

Make a clear way for your successor. Leave no ugly jobs on hand to meet him at his coming. You may enter into other men's labors; see that those who enter into yours shall have no cause to complain.

Are the class-books in order, and the statistics made up? Have the stewards squared accounts? Is the preacher's claim met? Surely, brethren, you don't intend to charge him from fifty to two hundred dollars for the privilege of serving you this year.

A true pastor—and indeed every other true worker—is more concerned about the character of his successor than of his predecessor. He does not mind hard ploughing and planting, but O how he feels for that he has planted, that it should be daily watered and cared for! Therefore, prepare for your successor, that he may take hold where you left off, and no time lost nor tempers soured in getting the clue of a tangled work.

One of our Bishops, in giving a charge to the young clergy, is in the habit of saying, "When you leave a circuit or station, leave it. Don't exact a promise from all the young people, that when they get married you are to be sent for; let your successor do that, and have all the perquisites as well as the burdens that fall to him." Now, a homespun sense and philosophy is there. That Bishop has been in the rank and file—he knows the practical working of itinerancy. It requires unselfish generosity. It goes upon a system of broad reciprocity. Let not the preachers, by pre-engagements before leaving their circuits, get in the way of each other, nor the people and pastors get in the way of the appointing power—the Bishop.

Finally, about those young preachers to be brought up: The Presiding Elders are the recruiting officers of the ministry. We suggest that they preach on a call to it, talk on it, and seek personal interviews with those who are resisting the Spirit. Even one called of the Lord has been found, and may be again, "hid among the stuff." Bishop Ashury used to say of Philip Bruce, that prince of Presiding Elders, that he could always tell him at a distance—from the number of young preachers he brought along with him.

TWO MEN OF MARK.

It has been our good fortune recently to make the acquaintance of two public men who have impressed us with he ldea, that, after all, the age of great men has not altogether gone by. Of course they are not politicians; and yet politicians may be, if they would, both good and great; only, it seems, they will not, as a general rule.

The new acquaintances to whom we refer, are the Rev. E. C. Slater and the Rev. George W. Carter—we mention them in the order in which we made their acquaintance—the former, Presiding Elder of this District; the other, Professor of Moral Science and Belles Lettres in the University of Mississippi, both Methodists. Mr. Slater delivered two addresses in this country last week—one at New Castle Female Institute, the other at a Masonic Celebration at Middleburg. The first we had the pleasure of hearing; and all who heard it had the same estimate we did—namely, that it was one of the best productions of the kind ever delivered in this country.

On Sunday last, we listened to a sermon from Professor Carter, at Carmel Church, Marshall county, Miss. Such a sermon has not been heard in these parts for this many a day. It was plain and unpretending, and yet full of the very highest results of thought. It was simple, yet grand; profound, yet clear as the sun to the commonest understanding. It was hardly oratorical, according to the popular notion; and yet it was wonderfully eloquent.

We mean no levity or irreverence when we say we rather like the Methodist Church. We think its system of evangelization better devised than almost any other for converting the world. Its itinerancy is a miracle in design, in adaptation, and in practical results. But we should like it a great deal better if it had more of such ministers as Messrs. Carter and Slater; men of learning as well as piety—men qualified to teach as well as preach; who can be zealous without rant, and who, as a weapon for cutting down sinners, rely more upon the love of God, than upon that 'hangman's whip,' 'the fear o' hell.' Mr. Slater is a man of rare versatility. He is at once eloquent, humorous, witty, brilliant and profound. Mr. Carter is a thinker, and all his eloquence proceeds from the depth of insight into his subject which he discloses to his hearers; the perfect lucidity he displays, and the amazing tenacity with which he sticks to and develops and irradiates his text. Mr. Slater is more episodical; Mr. Carter talks right on. The one, sometimes turns aside from the pursuit of his subject to gather beautiful flowers by the wayside and bind them up in rare boquets for his hearers; the other keeps his mind ever fixed on the main subject, and carries the minds of his hearers on, by a sort of giant but gentle power, to its complete mastery. Mr. Slater's mind is very much like Everett's; Mr. Carter's wonderfully like that of Calhoun.

DEDICATION AT ARCOLA.

Last Sabbath was a week ago, we went, by invitation, up the Jackson Railroad seventy-two miles to preach the Sermon at the dedication of a new Church recently built there. We have not had a more delightful visit in many a day. Arcola is on the first undulating land after we leave New Orleans, one hundred and thirty feet higher than the city. It is in the pine woods, mixed with oak and hickory, with good land for gardens, good clay subsoil, good water, cool, breezy, and healthy—a most delightful place for a summer residence. We saw ladies and children, who left the city in feeble health, now robust and rosy.

The Church is capable of seating about two hundred and fifty persons, and its architecture is not surpassed by that of any country Church we have ever seen. They are going to add a gallery for the accommodation of the servants. The house was full—the sermon was preached—the preacher, at the close, said five hundred dollars were needed to pay the debt—it was subscribed at once.

The Church was built by Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, Methodists, and men who are members of no Church. It was proposed to have a "Union" Church. They said "no—a union Church is no Church at all." What shall it be? Though the Methodist representation in the council held to determine the question, was smallest, they resolved to make it a Methodist Church—and have so deeded it—because they thought, all things considered, it would more nearly suit the population concerned. More good sense and catholicity we have not witnessed. It was pleasant, during the dedication services, to witness men of other Churches, and men of the world, voluntarily acting as Church officers—seating the congregation, etc. They have a fine Sunday-school, presided over by Dr. Parham, father of our friend, the Superintendent of Public Schools in the Fourth District of this city.

And with such gentlemen as Messrs. Seymour, Converse, Randolph, Pasteur, Col. Wood, Ellis, Mann, Manning, Stanley, Duncan, and others whose names we cannot recollect on so short an acquaintance, the Society of the place—part from city and part from country—need not be doubted. Arcola is a place, and will be more so. Mark that. We have not found a more liberal, whole-souled company of gentlemen and ladies anywhere. Their little village just settled, they must have a Church at once—and they have it. We are going back—often—if not oftener.

SONGS OF THE WESLEY'S.

The reader of Wesley's Journal will find an item on this wise. He was riding through a village street, not knowing where to stop—heard a servant-maid singing at her work "one of our songs," and knew by that "that some of our people lived there." The editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal gives an article on Wesleyan hymns and poetry that explains this:

"The Wesleys published their first hymn book as early as 1738, the year in which they date their regenerated life, and the next year, the epoch of Methodism, was signalized by the appearance of their 'Hymns and Sacred Poems,' two editions of which appeared before its close. And now rapidly followed, year after year, and sometimes twice a year, not only new editions of these volumes, but new poetic works, which were scattered more extensively than any other of their publications through England, Wales, Ireland, the British West Indies, the North American provinces, and the United States, till not less than forty-nine poetical publications were enumerated among their literary works; and before Wesley's death a common psalmody, sung mostly to a common music, resounded through all the Methodist chapels of the English and American world. The achievement accomplished by Methodism in this one respect is alone one of the most extraordinary historical facts of the last century. Its influence on the popular taste, intellectual as well as moral, could not fail to be incalculably great. So thorough has been the subsequent revolution in the popular appreciation of sacred poetry, that much of the psalmody sung in the Churches of England at the advent of Methodism would not now be tolerated in public assemblies. Its effect, in many instances, would even be ludicrous."

LETTER FROM BROOKHAVEN.

Mr. Editor: We closed last night a very interesting and profitable meeting at this place. Our commodious church was filled frequently—the attendance was uniformly good. Several ministers came to our aid, and God was present to own and bless their labors. The result is, an addition of twelve white members on probation, and three by letter—two of the latter were from the Baptist Church; eight or ten were converted; eight professed sanctification; backsliders were reclaimed, and the Church greatly revived. Altogether we had a refreshing season. Impressions were made that we hope will ere long develope in still more glorious results.

Brookhaven is becoming an important point. Improvement and enterprize are manifest in more respects than one. Our Church, under God, bid fair to do well, and be an instrument of great good to this people. We have a flourishing Sunday-school, and our enterprising Bro. Whitworth, whose heart and hand are ready for any good work, in connection with Bro. Harris, is pushing forward the work of erecting a splendid building, to be used as a College for young ladies.

With a fine large church, an extensive college-building, good schools, and a steadily improving society, we have reason to anticipate a bright and glorious future for Brookhaven. God be praised for all that has been accomplished; and may He continue to water with dews of grace the vine He has planted here.

R. T. HENNINGTON.

The Male Department of Centenary Institute, Rev. D. C. B. Conuerly Principal, is advertised on third page, fourth column. As we have so frequently and fully noticed Centenary Institute, and as the Report of the examination appeared in last week's paper, it is only necessary to say that it is as flourishing as ever.

LITERARY.

Milton's Autograph.—The London Star says that a late sale of ancient manuscripts, autographs, etc., Milton's receipt to the publisher for the purchase money of "Paradise Lost," was knocked down at the price of £45 to a gentleman who bought it on commission for the United States. This receipt, in Milton's own writing, is now on its way to Philadelphia.

A newspaper is about to be established in New York, by the "Spanish-American Printing Company," entitled El Noticioso de Nueva York. It is "dedicated to the defense of the interest of the Spanish-American Republics, and in which they should find at the same time a sympathetic exponent and advocate of their opinions." It will be published six times a month—on the days when the steamers leave for Spanish America and the Antilles.

The site of the house in which Dr. Johnson lived and died, in Bolt court, Fleet street, has been bought by the Stationers' Company of London; and the Stationers are about to erect a school for booksellers on the site of Johnson's house.

The Ten Tribes of Israel.—Mr. I. L. Benjamin, a Moldavian by birth, has explored a great part of Asia and Africa, and is about exploring the other parts of the world, with a view of writing a complete history of the remains of the ten tribes of Israel scattered over the globe. His ultimate purpose is a comprehensive history of the Jews. He has now a work in press entitled Acht Jahr in Asien und Afrika, (eight years in Asia and Africa,) which embraces his investigations in those parts of the world.

Mount Lebanon University.—This institution, under the auspices of the Louisiana Baptist State Convention, reports for 1858-59, 114 students. Its Faculty is composed as follows: J. Hartwell, D.D., President, Professor of Theology, and Instructor in Modern Languages: J. A. Simmons, A.M., Professor of Mathematics and Philosophy: B. A. Mathews, M.D., Professor of Ancient Languages and Chemistry. The Professorship of Belles Letters and Mental Science is vacant at present. C. S. Yearwood is Tutor in the Preparatory and Messrs. Simmons and Mathews in the Preparatory Department.

CHURCHES IN WASHINGTON.

Rev. James Peelen, a local preacher of Florida, has patented two useful agricultural implements—one of them a plough, which is spoken of—and has given to the Southern Methodist Church, at Washington (D. C.) the exclusive right to both patents for the District of Columbia and State of Virginia, and also an interest in them for all the States North of Washington, except Maryland and Delaware.

The Metropolitan Church of the Northern Methodists, magnificent in plan, has been lingering for some time past, and the trustees have been anxious to sell the lot. Another effort to build is to be made, however.

The New School Presbyterians are strong in Washington. The Old School denomination is small. It has a parsonage house, and $ 80,000 for building a Church—a gentleman of the South has given $ 25,000 to endow the pastorate, and a Southern lady $5000 to furnish the parsonage.

These facts, says the Southern Methodist pastor in Washington, all plead for our own Church in that city. We take the opportunity of again reminding our readers that the book of Sermons, with portraits of distinguished preachers, published in aid of a Southern Methodist Church building at Washington, is for sale at publisher's prices, at the Publishing House and the Conference Depositories.

THE HOME CIRCLE.

In the fourth column of the third page of this paper our readers will find an "Announcement," setting forth in full the improvements and attractions of the "Home Circle for 1860." The friends of this, our only periodical for ladies, throughout the South, will read it with interest. When the arrangements are all completed it will be the leading Monthly in the Southern States, equal to any in the whole country. The subscription list ought to be doubled forthwith. No one, we imagine, will fail to subscribe, if he have not already done so after reading the announcement, and no preacher should fail to direct attention to it, and "enlarge" thereby. The success of our periodical literature is in the hands of our preachers, for weal or woe. They should remember this. Every editor is faithfully fulfilling his trust, and every periodical is growing in value and power. The Agency—the Agency! There is where we should "strengthen the things that remain."

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.

This Institution is under the supervision of Professors Magruder and Parsons, assisted by an efficient corps of teachers.

I had the pleasure of witnessing the Exhibition exercises of the Institution recently, and am gratified to say that they were most satisfactory.

All the usual branches of English are taught, with Mathematics, Latin, Greek and French. As far as it pretends to go, the mental and scholastic training is most thorough. It is the design to prepare young men to enter into any College.

I send my own son to this Institution, and from what I know of its scholarly training and moral discipline, I can most confidently commend it to the patronage of the public.

J. B. Walker.

Camp Ground Burnt.—We are sorry to learn, by letter from Rev. F. M. Featherston, that the Camp ground on Mt. Olivet circuit, Mississippi Conference, was burnt August 3d., supposed by an incendiary.

"Foot Prints Across the Continent, No. iv," is an exceedingly interesting letter from Bishop Pierce, and we expect another shortly.

"Joe Smith and the Bible," on the first page, is strikingly suggestive to a thoughtful reader. Let us hear from the author again.

"Ye Have Need of Patience" is a new sermon on an old text, instead of an old sermon on a new subject as to "contents" say. Let us have more such sermons. They ought to be delivered in the spring of the year, however, or at least from now until then.

New Subscribers are coming in. Send them along. As soon as you read this, whoever you are, see how many new subscribers you can obtain.

Auburn Male College has a comprehensive and luminous advertisement on the third page, sixth column. Read it. We shall notice this institution again soon, also the Southern University.

Prof. Magruder's Collegiate Institute at Baton Rouge, is advertised in fifth column of third page. Walker's notice of it we heartily endorse.

Feliciana Female Institute, Jackson, La., has an advertisement on third page, fifth column. It is a pleasant and promising institution under the charge of Rev. T. Brown. Read his advertisement and "wants."

Brook's Boarding House is as popular as ever. His "peach-cobblers" for dinner were never better. When you come to the city go to Brooks'.

Wesleyan Female College, Macon, Ga., has an advertisement on the fourth page of this paper, fifth column. It is, as we said a week or two since, the best female college in the world. President Bonnell has a fine reputation as an instructor, in Georgia, Kentucky and Alabama. The College is in a highly prosperous condition.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Cedar Creek Circuit.—REV. T. MOONY writes: "Our meeting at Pine Flat Chapel, continued some nine days and was attended with success. The congregation, attentive and serious—many at the altar. Some nine or ten whites united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, also some nineteen colored.

"The week following, we commenced another at Snow Hill. This continued near two weeks—many at the altar night and day—much seriousness in the congregation all the time. Some fourteen whites professed faith in Christ, and united with our Church; and some nineteen colored. There were some of the brightest conversions at that meeting I have witnessed this year.

"The week following, which was last week, we commenced another at Warrenton. The congregation large and serious—night and day the interest increased from its commencement. But we were compelled to break up in view of another appointment, with a number at the altar. Some six whites joined the Church, and professed to be converted.

"And now, Brother Editor, you have the state of the work on this circuit. And still they come—and still the work goes on! What we lack here is the right sort of laborers in the vineyard of the Lord. Our system and plans seem to suit the people. What we want, le now to put them properly in motion."

"May God give the increase."

Revival at West Ward Mobile.—REV. J. W. WILLIAMS writes: "We have just closed a very interesting meeting of three weeks. We have closed only to rest. The Lord wonderfully blessed the Church—converted sinners, seventeen were added to the Church on probation, and still there are numbers inquiring the way of life everlasting. Praise God for his goodness to the people of the West Ward Church.

"Permit me to add a few words concerning our Sabbath-school. Our second exhibition came off last night. We have monthly meetings, at which we hear speeches and dialogues from the children and take up a collection for the school. Last night the children were early at their places; it would have delighted you, Mr. Editor, to have seen them, every countenance was beaming with joy and gladness—their eyes sparkling like so many stars.

"The services were opened with singing, and prayer to Almighty God for his blessing, by Brother W. B. Phillips. Singing conducted by the Superintendent, Brother A. G. Moore, a champion in the Sunday-school cause. Then the speaking commenced—the children acquitted themselves nobly.

"I thank God that I have had the happiness of being the Pastor of the West Ward Methodist Episcopal Church, and I pray the blessing of our God upon the Church and School."

Talladega District.—REV. W. D. MATHEWS writes: "I wrote you about the last of May, giving you some account of an interesting meeting or two, in which we had gathered some twenty probationers into the Church; which letter I suppose must have miscarried, it was dated about the last of May. Since which time there has been a general improvement in the District; and the good work has gone on at the points designated in my former letter, viz: Hillabee and Arbacoochee; and thirty or forty others have been converted and gnthered into the Church. We now have an encouraging state, throughout the bounds of the District, and as soon as party strife and political excitement pass away, which it will do after next Monday, we are confidently looking for a general, sweeping revival. O, that it may exceed our very largest expectations."

Spring Hill Circuit.—REV. L. M. WILSON writes: "We are having a good meeting at this place, Jefferson. About twenty have been converted—and earnest penitents still at the altar. Bros. Shores, McClosky and J. B. Cottrell, have rendered efficient service. This is the third week of the meeting, and it is still going on. I called on the congregation on the last Sunday, and got over two hundred dollars missionary money. If the Orrville circuit does not stir up, her banner will trail in the dust this year."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Brandon Circuit.—THE PASTOR writes: "We commenced a protracted meeting at Pleasant Ridge, on Saturday before the 4th Sabbath in July. On Tuesday night, one penitent young lady found the Lord. Thursday night we were compelled to close the meeting, in order to reach another appointment. The result, as far as we can judge, is as follows: Thirteen were happily converted. Fourteen whites joined the Church on probation, and eleven colored.

"We went to Bethel, and found the local preachers and exhorters laboring hard for a revivel. They commenced the meeting on Thursday before the 5th Sabbath. We reached the meeting in time for the eleven o'clock service, (Saturday morning.) We did not have to labor long, before we heard the shouts of new-born souls. On Sabbath we administered the Sacrament of the Lord's supper; we do not recollect of having seen a better time around the Lord's table for many years. We succeeded in getting some of our Baptist friends to believe that the sacrament of the Lord's supper is not ours, nor theirs—but the Lord's. They demonstrated their faith by their works. Some of them met us around the tabe of our common Lord, and received the elements at our hands.

"We left the meeting on Wednesday after the eleven o'clock services, up to which time twenty-two persons professed to received pardoning love, and fifteen whites joined the Church on probation. O, Lord revive thy work more abundantly."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

New Iberia Circuit.—REV. T. B. WHITE writes: "We are still enjoying refreshing seasons from the presence of the Lord. We had a meeting at Prairie Gregg of three days, embracing the 5th Sabbath in July; at which, the word preached was attended with power. Five joined the Church. The Church considerably revived. A subscription was raised to build a house of worship, there being none in the neighborhood; and a sufficiency subscribed to proceed at once with the house. Truly we are having a glorious revivnl in Church building on our circuit.

"It is due to Brother J. W. Chevis, to say that he has faithfully labored in most of the meetings we have had on the circuit. He is an industrious local preacher."

Farmerville Circuit.—REV. D. P. CULLEN writes: "We are having good times. Within the last three weeks some twenty persons have professed religion. Thirty whites and six colored persons have joined the Church. The members wonderfully blessed. We have efficient local preachers on this circuit. They are doing valuable service.

PERSONAL.

THE POPE.—The Paris Univers, the ultra Catholic organ makes it clear that the Pope has not yet come to any decision respecting the honorary presidency of the proposed Italian Confederacy.

A Paris correspondent of the Nord, writing on the 19th ult., says a letter from Rome states that the Pope accepts, on certain conditions, the title of Honorary President of the Italian Confederation. The Italian diet would assemble at Rome.

DICKENS.—On the authority of a private letter which arrived by the Persia, from an intimate personal friend of the novelist, says the New York Evening Post, we are glad to announce that Charles Dickens will visit this country during the ensuing autumn, and give the readings from his own works that have been successful in England.

MRS. MARGARET FULLER, (mother of Margaret Fuller, Countess d'Ossoli, Rev. A. B. Fuller, Esq., of Boston,) died on the 31st ult., at the residence of the latter gentleman, at Wayland, Mass., aged seventy years.

THE REV. DR. JAMES W. ALEXANDER, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, corner of Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth street, New York, died on the 21st ult., at the Virginia Springs.

TWO SONS OF KOSSUTH recently received prizes as students in the University College, London. They were given from the hand of the British Premier, Lord Palmerston.

ALTHOUGH THE FRENCH LANGUAGE is usually that of diplomacy, a letter-writer learns that out of courtesy to the Emperor of Austria, Napoleon III spoke in German during their interviews.

THE BOSTON LEDGER says the stirrup-cup of the poet Burns is in the possession of a gentleman of Boston. It was made from the leg of a table brought from the Holy Land by King Robert the Bruce, and is undoubtedly genuine. It was sold among the effects of the poet's wife.

LABORS OF EDWARD EVERETT.—The August number of the Eclectic Magazine, in speaking of Hon. Edward Everett, gives an account of his labors in connection with the Mount Vernon Fund. His Washington Oration was first delivered February 22, 1856, and has been given since then one hundred and twenty-nine times, yielding $55,783 62. For the "Mount Vernon Papers" in the New York Ledger, he received $10,000, and in other ways smaller sums making a contribution to the Mount Vernon Fund of $68,103 56. In addition to his other labors for this object, he has delivered lectures for other benevolent associations, making a total of more than ninety thousand dollars in little more than three years. It is to be understood, too, that Mr. Everett has traveled many thousand miles, and defrayed all his expenses from his private purse. He has done this, too, when much occupied by private and public affairs, and frequently delicate health. No man we are confident, ever before did so much for noble objects in so short a time. All honor to this statesman, orator, scholar and noble man.

THE LATE HORACE MANN.—Mr. Mann was born in Franklin, Mass., on the 4th of May, 1796, and was consequently in his sixty-fourth year at the time of his death, recently mentioned by telegraph. He was educated at Brown University, and practiced law with great success in his native State until he accepted the post of Secretary of the Board of Education for Massachusetts, in which position he devoted himself with singular zeal to his duties. In 1836 he was elected to the Senate of Massachusetts from Boston, and on the death of John Quincy Adams he was elected as his successor in Congress in 1848. In 1853 he accepted the post of President of Antioch College. The New York Times says:

THE FRENCH ON ENGLISH ARMAMENTS.

The recent article in the Paris Journal des Debats, directed against England, which had attracted so much attention in European political circles, referred in a disquieting manner to the additions which England is making to her navy, and it concludes as follows:

If by one of those veerings about, which are possible any day in parliamentary governments, a decision by a majority of few votes more or less, should bring back to power tomorrow the party even-threwn yesterday, would its programme be traced out in the speeches delivered by the opposition in the House of Lords? That would be serious. Distrust, menace, almost insult with regard to France, this is what we find in these manifestoes of the Tory party; distrust, although the government of the Emperor does not cease by its words and acts to reassure Europe respecting its intentions; menace, although France abstains scrupulously from all provocation, although she has made no armed preparations beyond the requirements of the Italian war; lastly, almost insult, ill-dissembled beneath this strange appeal to unparalleled passions. These are bad proceedings towards any one, dangerous towards us. England may have believed it to be her duty to remain neutral, and forgetting her liberal policy, she may not have wished to attempt with France to free Italy. We are not going to examine after the peace whether she was wrong or right before the war; but that her neutrality should be ostensibly armed against us, that is what we do not understand, because nothing explains or justifies it.

France does not put forth the pretension to dominate anywhere. On the scene as on the continent she only desires her legitimate share of liberty and action. Is it to be said that she ought to acknowledge and submit to this domination on the part of another power? Like England, France has rich and populous coasts, colonies near and far, a great maritime commerce, religious, political, industrial interests, in fine, a moral influence to protect over the entire surface of the globe; she has for that an army and a navy, proportioned to her population, wealth and greatness. When she sees herself constrained to do so by her honor or interests, France employs, such being her purpose, against her enemies the forces at her disposal; but she does not threaten her friends or allies, she does not doubt their loyalty, she does not provoke them by suspicions unworthy of a great nation.

We no longer believe in hereditary hatreds; we do not wish to believe any longer in traditional resentments between the two peoples. A long peace, a long interchange of relations of every kind, upon a footing of equal mutual esteem, have laid to rest, or so we fancied, those anachronisms left for dead, with our glorious soldiers, upon the battle-fields of the Alma and Inkermann. Can we be mistaken?

To the suspicious and hostile neutrality of England and Germany, France has opposed only calmness and moderation. The victorious Emperor restored peace to astonish Europe; can Europe be less moderate and pacific than the Emperor? England, who inquires about a vessel, more or less, armed at Brest, and who votes three hundred millions for her navy, England who counsels so loudly the Continent to disarm, is she going to set the example and withdraw from her order of the day this programme of menace or of fear, the fatal effect of which we have been obliged to notice, keeping in view the alliance that we should wish to preserve? When a cloud highly charged with electricity passes over our heads, why risk the eliciting of the flash from it? Who knows were it might fall?

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

The Italian Confederation—Reduction of the French Army—British Ministry and the Peace Congress—Constitutional Movement in Austria—The Popular Vote in Tuscany—Insurrection in Venetia—The Ashes of Napoleon II. Restored to France—Parliamentary Proceedings.

General and Political Intelligence.

LIVERPOOL, July 27.—The proposition submitted by Count Walewski, the French Foreign Minister, for the settlement of the Italian Confederation, makes provision for the return of the Grand Duke of Tuscany and Modena, on condition of their granting a general amnesty for political offences and instituting salutary reforms in the administration of their Governments.

The Venetian kingdom is to form part of the Confederation, but to remain under the crown of Austria.

LIVERPOOL, July 30.—Advices from Turin represent that the excitement which was at first created by the announcement of the terms of peace, has considerably subsided, and that comparative tranquility has been restored in most of the Italian Provinces.

The Debates in the British Parliament indicate that vigorous measures will be adopted in the prosecution of the plans proposed for the national defenses.

The Sardinian Plenipotentiary to the Peace Conference at Zurich has arrived at Paris.

The Independence Belge newspaper says that the Austrian Provisional Councils will all soon be convoked, and be requested to make known to the Emperor of Austria openly and sincerely the wishes of their respective populations, with a view of granting them liberal constitutional reforms.

The Belge also states that the first Austrian corps d'armee will, for the present, be maintained in Italy on a war footing.

The remaining corps of the Austrian army in Italy are to go to their former cantonments in Gallicia and Hungary.

The various Governors appointed by King Victor Emanuel in Modena have withdrawn, and the Governments turned over to the Municipalities.

The result of the vote upon the subject of the annexation of Tuscany to Piedmont, as made known at 141 places, including Leghorn and Florence, show 809 votes in the affirmative and only 15 in the negative.

An article in Le Nord newspaper denies that French troops are to remain in the Duchies to preserve order.

A letter from Milan states that the extreme party are commencing a dangerous agitation there, and that an insurrection in the Venetian Kingdom is anticipated.

The Invalide Russe says that Austria and France may make whatever treaties they please, but that in fixing the lot of Italy they are bound to ask the concurrence of the rest of Europe.

It appears that one of the results of the meeting of the two Emperors at Villa Franca was a stipulation providing for the removal of the remains of Napoleon II. from Vienna to Paris.

A deputation, headed by Prince Napoleon, will soon proceed to Vienna to take the remains of the Duc de Reichstadt (Napoleon II.,) which are deposited in the Augustine Monastery at Vienna, and convey them to France, where they will be placed by the side of those of his father, Napoleon I.

In the House of Commons Lord John Russell, in making a statement in relation to foreign affairs, said that England could never be a party to any compact for forcing the Grand Dukes of Tuscany and Modena upon their people without their consent. He stated that he believed the Emperor of Austria was desirous that the people of Italy shall have a self-government. After a spirited discussion by various members the subject was dropped.

The Peace Conference.

Nothing of any moment had transpired in regard to the conference at Zurich, nor is it known whether Sardinia would take part.

The London Daily News believes that, although the scheme of an Italian Confederation may not have been formally struck off the programme, it is not now insisted on by its author, and that little more will be heard of it.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times is informed that the English Government had offered to send a representative to the Congress, provided France disarmed; that the French Emperor agreed to do so, on condition that England did the same; that England consented, on condition of a general disarmament by land and sea; that France will begin the movement, and that the English Government is very well satisfied with the conduct of the French Emperor.

It is asserted that a military Convention between France and Austria, relative to Italy, has been concluded, and that Lombardy is to take a fair share of the national debt.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says it was reported that Count Walewski had drawn out a plan for the Confederation of Italy, and submitted it confidentially to the Cabinet. It consists of seven States, and the Presidency is given nominally to the Pope, but really to the Kings of Sardinia and Naples alternately. The strong places to be garrisoned by Federal troops are Gaeta, Mantua and Piacenza. The votes in the Federal Diet are to be distributed as follows: Parma and Modena, one each; the Pope, two; Tuscany, two; Sardinia and Naples, each three.

France.

The Duke of Malakoff has been appointed Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honor.

The Emperor had granted a pension of three thousand francs from his private purse to the mother of General Auger, killed in Italy.

It was reported that 200,000 men are to be discharged from the army on renewable furlough, the advantage being that the Government will have them still on hand, while their cost can be diverted to other purposes.

The Paris Moniteur, of the 26th, contains the following: "It is endeavored in England to attribute to France the causes of the English national burdens, but the English people are deceived merely to further the national defenses; the exaggeration of our armaments is to justify a considerable increase of the budget for the army and navy. A comparison of the budgets of England and France will show that these considerations have been erroneous. Since 1815 the army expenses of England have increased by two hundred millions francs, making for 1860 a total of more than six hundred and fifty millions francs, while the French army budget of 1860 does not exceed four hundred and sixty-three million. One therefore asks, whether it is to France and her extraordinary armaments that the heavy burdens which weigh on the English people, are to be attributed, or whether these enormous expenses and taxes, which are the consequences of those burdens, must not be attributed to other reasons."

The Paris, Patrie, referring to the above article from the Moniteur, says that France has done everything to free England from the nightmare of invasion, in order to restore her to her calmness and repose. If unsuccessful, England can only blame herself for her fears which agitated her, and which, if prolonged, would be an affront to the sincerity, friendly feelings and actions of France.

The Paris correspondent of the London Morning Herald says that there is something like two hundred million francs unexpended out of the late loan, and it is understood that the surplus is to be applied to the navy.

The Post's Paris correspondent says there is the same disposition as ever in official quarters to assure England that the Emperor and his advisers consider the Anglo-French alliance now as ever necessary for the tranquility and prosperity of Europe.

The Moniteur de la Flotte, Government organ, says that Denmark has ceded the Island of St. Thomas to the United States.

Italy.

Le Nord says one of the first acts of the new Sardinian Ministry will be to put an end to the present Dictatorship, to convoke the Chambers, and present an electoral bill applicable to Lombardy. A dissolution will afterwards take place. In order to effect in the new Chambers the complete fusion of Piedmont and Lombardy, the King will preside, and the Parliament will sit alternate years at Turin and Milan.

Turin journals say that the Sardinian army, reinforced by recruitments in Lombardy, is to be raised to 100,000 men.

In regard to Garibaldi's position, it is said that he was on the 15th summoned to Brescia by General Della Marmora, with whom he had a long confidential interview; that he had a force of 12,000 men, which continued to increase; and that he expressed confidence in the King of Surdinia's not forsaking the national cause.

A letter from Milan says that Garibaldi was contemplating a move from the Alps to the Apennines—from Northern to Central Italy. Then there will be a gathering of about 50,000 volunteers in the Romagna, and Garibaldi's corps joined to that of Mezzocapo will form an army capable of securing the independence of Central Italy.

It was rumored that the Duke of Modena proposed to arm 4000 Austrian troops to enable him to enter his States; also that a division of the French army will enter Parma and Tuscany, and another corps the Roman Legation, for the purpose simply of preserving order and allowing a free expression of public opinion.

The Municipality of Florence had formerly expressed a desire for annexation to an Italian Kingdom under Victor Emanuel or that Tuscany should be governed by a Prince of the House of Savoy, in case annexation should be impossible.

The Pontifical Government has issued a circular to its representatives abroad complaining that the refusal of the dictatorship of the Roman Legations by the King of Sardinia was completely illusory; the nomination of the Marquis D'Azeglio is complained of as a flagrant violation of its neutrality; other acts of usurpation against the legitimate authority of the Pope are quoted, and a circular says they provoked in the Holy Father much indignation at seeing that such enormities proceeded from the Government of a Catholic King, who had accepted the advice of his ungustally to refuse the dictatorship offered him. His Holiness decrees this protest to be communicated to all the European powers, and trusts they will co-operate in vindicating his rights, for which purpose he invoked their assistance and protection.

Great numbers of addresses were being signed in the Romagna against the return of the Clerical Government, and in favor of Union with Sardinia. The country had resolved upon keeping up public order, and of repulsing every attack of the Swiss troops in the service of the Pope; also that regular voting should take place in expressing the wishes of the country.

Letters from Rome assert that the principle of an Italian Confederation had been accepted by the Pope; a majority of the Cardinals in conference voted in favor of the Pope's accepting the Presidency.

A Paris telegram, of 26th, to the London Morning Post, says, Sardinia has named as her Plenipotentiary at Zurich, M. des Ambrois. Austria, however, refuses to meet any Sardinian representative, but will leave it open to Sardinia to accede to the treaty after it shall have been concluded between Austria and France.

The same authority says, the Grand Duke of Tuscany has expressed a willingness to abdicate in favor of his son, who promises a constitution, but the Tuscans object altogether to the dynasty.

Great Britain.

The Times says that another French loan will be wanted before long. The same journal replies to the Moniteur's article on the armament of the two countries, and says it is in many respects deceptive. The Times strongly urges immediate arming of the navy with Armstrong guns, and increased expedition in the manufacture of guns by private contract.

August 4.—Orders have been issued from the war-office, or are about to be issued, for the immediate dissolution of the Rhine.

The latest advices from the Continent are of a pacific and more assuring character.

The French Government, it is stated without qualification is preparing for a general disarmament, and giving every evidence of its present pacific intentions.

The American Minister at Rome has obtained from the Papal Government £400 for damages sustained during the recent sacking of Perugia.

Laws upon the Slave Trade.

WASHINGTON, August 9.—The conflicting nature of the laws of 1818 and those enacted by Congress in 1820 upon the subject of the slave trade will probably cause the question to be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States.

The former prescribe a fine and imprisonment, the latter make the penalty death for aiding or abetting in the importation of Africans within the United States.

The Wise Presidential Letter Verified.

WASHINGTON, August 10.—In reply to numerous inquiries on the subject of the authorship of the letter published in the New York Herald, stating that President Buchanan was a candidate for re-nomination, and that the patronage and power of the Government would be used to defeat the nomination of Douglas, or any other aspirant, Governor Wise admits that it was authentic and acknowledges himself to be the author of it, but denounces the publication of it as a breach of confidence, it being a private letter addressed only to Mr. Bernard Donnelly.

Increase of Georgia Wealth.

The Atlanta Intelligencer learns from the Controller General that the digests of 112 counties, returned to his office, show an increase of the taxable property of the State for the past year of fifty millions of dollars, in the county for which returns have been received.

LOCAL.

The History of Cuba by a Cuban.

A work of very great interest to the historical student, to the philanthropist, and above all to the Cuban Patriot, says the Delta, has just been published in this city. It is a work on the history of Cuba, being the compilation of a series of lectures, by Senor Pedro Santacilia, a distinguished Cuban and patriot, now a resident of New Orleans. The production of a cultivated scholar and an accomplished orator, it is not less characterized by close argument and research, and elegant diction, than by fervid eloquence and manly sentiment. We would be glad to see the translation of a work which has so much to recommend it to every friend of Cuban liberty, and to all who feel a solicitude in regard to the destiny of the beautiful island to which it relates.

A Duel at Algiers.

A Duel was fought last week, near the Opelousas Railroad Depot, in Algiers, by two military gentlemen of the Second District. The weapons were sharpened foils. At the word, the combatants made, simultaneous lunges, each pinking the other, and ending the combat before it had well begun. Neither was severely wounded.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, August 15, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 13th instant. Another week of dullness and inactivity has passed, and we are without any important changes to notice in the general market. Occasional limited parcels of the new crop of Cotton have begun to arrive, but several weeks must elapse before the receipts will be adequate to any movement of much consequence.

On Monday morning European advices four days later were before the public, reporting an active demand in the Liverpool Cotton market, the sales for three days having summed up 44,000 bales, generally at firm prices, some authorities reporting an advance of ⅛d. On Wednesday advices were received by the regular weekly Cunard steamer Arabia, reporting the week's sales of Cotton at Liverpool to have been 62,000 bales, and the quotations given were ⅛d for Fair Orleans and 7 3-16d for Middling ditto; showing an improvement within the week of 1-16d in the latter quality. The total stock of Cotton at Liverpool was 679,000, of which 607,500 bales were American. The Havana Cotton market remained steady and 112 francs was still the quotation for Tres ordinaire. There was rather more confidence in political matters, and Consols had advanced 1¼ per cent within the week, being quoted at 95¼ to 95¾.

Telegraphic advices by Ery of Baltimore, with Liverpool dates to 4th inst. which report the sales of Cotton for three days to have been 19,000 bales, and the quotation given is still 7 3-16d for Middling Orleans, though at the close some forced sales were said to have been made at ⅛d decline. Manchester advices were favorable and Consols were quoted at 94¾ to 95, which would indicate a decline of ¼ per cent.

The weather has been generally clear and warm throughout the past week, though showers more or less copious have fallen nearly every day.

The health of the City continues good, not a case of yellow fever having occurred, so far as we are advised.

The river has fallen one inch within the week, and is now ten feet nine inches below high-water mark.

COTTON.—Another week has passed, and has established its claim to be designated the dullest of the season thus far. There is but a very limited number of buyers, and the few orders which those parties have in hand are not available in our present meagre, and poorly assorted stock. The enquiry, when buyers come forward at all, is mostly for Low Middling, Middling and Strict Middling, and of these descriptions the market is about bare, nearly the whole of the remaining stock being low-running, mixed and dusty lists, which are unsaleable. Under these circumstances the entire business of the week sums up barely 1650 bales, and since 1st September, (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,662,085 bales against 1,503,975 bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 5413, bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 12th inst., 11,411. We may remark that a good class of Middling, if at all even-running, would, if obtainable, command a fraction above our outside figures.

The receipts of new crop thus far are 88 bales, against 83 bales to same date last year, and the sales of which we are advised within the week are 22 bales Strict Middling at 12,5 bales at 12 1-10 and ⅛ at 12½ cents per pound. The receipts thus far are generally of good color, and fair staple, but much napped in ginning, the picking having been evidently rather premature.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

Married on the 20th ult. by Rev. J. B. Baldwin, at the residence of the bride's mother, Mr. HENRY RICHARDS to Miss MARTHA C. MALONE—all of Mobile county, Alabama.

On 28th ult. by Rev. Samuel Briggs, at the residence of the bride's father, Mr. VINCENT WILLIAMS of Mississippi, to Miss EMELINE GEORGE of Mobile county, Alabama.

On 4th inst. by L. H. Norton, Esq., at Mr. Norton's residence, Mr. JOSEPH GILBERT to Miss MARIANNA WHITMON of Mobile, Alabama.

On 7th last. by Rev. A. B. Nicholson, Rev JAMES H. LENAY of the Mississippi Conference to Miss CAROLINE A. ELLERY of Pike county, Mississippi.

DIED:

Near Greenville, Washington county, Mississippi, on the 24th June, 1859, JAMES ARMSTRONG, infant son of W. P. and E. C. Montgomery, aged ten months and four days.

"Pillowed on the Savior's breast,
Sweetly sleep and softly rest,
Soon the morning shall restore
The buried babe we now deplore." W. R. H.

At Port Gibson, Mississippi, August 8th, 1859, AARON BURNET, infant son of W. H. N. and Mary Magruder of Baton Rouge, aged eleven months.

On Thursday evening at three o'clock, at the family residence in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Mr. JAMES C. GAYLE, aged 34 years. Mr. Geyle's affliction was long and sore—but was sanctified to his spiritual and eternal good. During his long illness, he professed faith in Christ, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South; and partook of the Holy Communion. He leaves a father, mother and sister to cherish his memory and mourn his loss—though they sorrow not as those who have no hope. W. * * * * *.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

GREENBORO HIGH SCHOOL—REV. J. W. N. MEARS, A.M. M.D.

Two exercises of the third session of this school will commence on the first day of September next.

The session comprises nine months—including the usual holidays—and is divided into three terms of three months each.

French will be taught for a small extra fee.

The Principal will take a very few boys under his immediate supervision in rooms adjoining his own. The amusement and labors of such boys out of school will be under the direction of the Principal.

Those parents who have sons to board out, will, it is thought, at once recognize the advantage of such an arrangement.

The play-grounds are ample and pleasant, and the house commodious and furnished most usually and comfortably.

Young men can prepare to enter the Junior class in any of our Colleges.

Miss E. D. Mears takes a limited number of young ladies on whose education she bestows particular care. All the branches essential to a polished education are taught.

The attention of parents is especially invited to this Department.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE. The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of October next.

The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.

As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.

Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

For information and Circulars, apply to Rev. J. S WALKER, New Orleans; Rev. C. G. YOUNG, Monroe; T. P. CLINTON, Esq., St Joseph; Rev. A. IVY, Alexandria; Rev. S. S. BEARD, Mansfield; or to Children's Column.

"Suffer Little Children to come unto Me."

Dow.

"It sparkled, was exhaled, and went to Heaven."

Georgie Elgin, son of Judge G. W. and Mary Shelton was born in Brandon, July 31st, 1849. He died July 4th, [illegible] bathing in a pond with a number of [illegible] he was drowned.

On Monday fever racked his little limbs, no trouble or danger nor frightful pictures in wild delirium clouded his sensitive brain. God in his love and mercy [illegible] from them. So brief was his transit from [illegible] heaven, that it could scarcely be realized as [illegible], after a brief moment of struggling his noble spirit [illegible] from his loving companions to that home [illegible] prepared by a Savior's love. To write the [illegible] of such a boy, our darling little Georgie, is a [illegible] task. It is difficult to do justice to one so [illegible] as he was at his age, without having the semblance of flattery.

All the rich treasures of his young mind and the almost infantile purity of his spirit were known to but comparatively few, from the fact that his parents loved him too tenderly to make an exhibition of his attainments, as some do for the gratification of their own vanity to the injury of their children. He was, however, even to a stranger, strikingly interesting and engaging: he combined true dignity and courtesy with that suavity and gentleness characteristic of the other sex. Although joyous and mirthful in the innocent pastimes of his playmates, he had great fondness for meditation and the perusal of such books as led the mind above the vanities of the world. The sweetness of his disposition shone particularly in the home circle, his uniform gentleness to his little brothers, forbearance and kindness to the domestics, and last though not least, his almost idolizing devotion to his parents. George's parents had labored assiduously to instill principles of truth, honor and justice in his tender mind, and to direct his enthusiastic spirit to the worship of God; and well did he repay them: his devotion to them was touchingly beautiful. A short time before his decease, he obtained permission to go on the square to spend some of his little change, he soon returned bringing to his dear mother a few nice peaches and apples, which were rare at that [illegible] he had deprived himself of the little notions, prized by boys, that he might get a treat for his mother: and when his mother gave him a peach he sought his little brothers and a servant child and divided between them his share. This self-denying generosity was one of his characteristics. A few days before his unexpected departure he requested his mother to give him half-a-dollar. She desired to know how he would spend it. "O, mamma, just let me go in town, and I will tell you after I have made the purchase." The little creature returned disappointed because he could not find the object, it was a present for his mamma, he put his little money up hoping at a future time to spend it. That half-dollar is doubtlessly prized as a souvenir by his bereaved mother, for it was found in his purse after his death. The amount of knowledge that this child had acquired was truly astonishing, and his selections of reading matter chaste and quite above his years. His library consisted of eighty-five volumes, he had read them all, and twice through some of them. After he had died his father found a collection of beautiful pieces of poetry (in a little box,) which he had clipped and preserved as for a scrap-book. Their themes were mostly religious, several on Death, "Invocation of Death," "The time to die," Heavens, etc. One of these pieces runs thus:

"There's many an empty cradle,
There's many a vacant bed,
There's many a lonesome bosom,
Whose joy and light is fled;
For thick in every graveyard
The little hillocks lie—
And every hillock represents
An angel in the sky."

Most surely does the hillock cover his precious dust, represent an angel in the sky. I have noticed his solemn and reverential manner when at a burial, and he had carefully preserved all the tickets to funerals, for three or four years past. He prized the teachings of the Bible: his memory of scripture passages was so retentive that he would sometimes puzzle older persons by his remarks. At school he was distinguished for his manliness, his obedience to his teachers and diligence in his studies. Although of feeble health, he had been for some time head of one of his classes. He was fond of poetry and enthusiastically so of music. I expect his sweet spirit often visited, in song, his present beautiful home. I can now see him, as I have, with his dark, bright eyes turned up in almost ecstacy of emotion while singing his favorite song, "The Child's wish." O, Georgie, my heart swells up in the bitterness of its grief, when at school, each day I see your vacant seat, and in our songs I miss your sweet carrolling. But we must do "Thy will be done." At Sabbath School he is missed, he was very punctual and attentive, and treasured the instructions of his kind teacher. The ways of God are unscrutable and past finding out; when we see such buds of promise early gathered, we mourn and wonder, but our Father doeth all things well. It seems as though the river that divides this from the Better land, had almost laved to his little feet, or the veil been partially lifted. He remarked to a friend a short time before he died, that he did not expect to live long: and to his mother he said, on the day before he died, "Mamma, I have been praying to Jesus for a new heart." His little prayer was doubtlessly answered, for he evinced the spirit of our Saviour in his forgiveness of injuries and of personal insult. He was truly a rare gem. His bereaved parents have the consoling assurance that he is to them a ministering angel, a child in bliss. Its true, their hope of seeing him useful and distinguished here has been blighted, but his mind is much more perfectly unfolding there, without telescope or instruments he knows more of the heavenly bodies than all the systems of astronomy could teach him in a life time of years. There are many hidden mysteries revealed to him, to say nothing of the beauties and wonders of science the glorious plan of man's redemption is now laid before his admiring view.

"I yearn for realms where fancy shall be filled, and the ecstacies of freedom shall be felt,
And the soul spin gloriously, risen to its royal destinies;
I look to recognize again, through the beautiful mask of their perfection,
Dear, familiar faces I have somewhile loved on earth;
I long to talk with gentle tongue of eternity and perfect past,
And praise the mighty Pilot that hath steered us through the world;
He shall be the focus of it all, the very heart of gladness.

Bellevue, July, 1859. J. F. J.

True Courage.

A company of boys in ——— street, Boston, one day after school, were engaged in snowballing. William had made a good hard snowball. In throwing it, he "put in too much powder," as the boys say—he threw it too hard—and it went farther than he intended, right [illegible] a parlor window!

All the boys shouted,

"Run, you'll catch it now. Run, Bill, run!"

Most then took to their heels.

But the brave William straightened up and looked sober, as he said,

"I shall not run."

He then started directly for the house where the window had been broken. He rang at the door, acknowledged what he had done, and expressed his regret. He then gave his name, and the name of his father, and his father's place of business, and said the injury should be repaired.

Was not that noble? That was true courage. It is sometimes that would lead a boy, when he has done an injury like that, to sneak away and run to conceal it. How noble and brave it is to see a boy confess a fault, and not be afraid to face the consequences.

Give me William, whenever any real bravery is called for, rather than all those boys together, who cried out, "Run, Bill, run."

He'll face the danger, while they will sneak.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

ARCHER E. JACKSON, a native of Tennessee, aged 25 years, died of consumption, on the 16th July, in this city. He was converted in his 18th year at Johnson's Camp-ground, Robinson county. He died in peace. He was a very patient sufferer. "If," said he, "it were not for the hope I have, I am sure I do not know how I could bear my sufferings." He rejoiced that he had sought the Lord first of all, in the start of life. He delighted in prayer, and talked freely and surely of the prospect of a Heavenly rest. He died as one might desire to, in his senses, surrounded by relatives, ministers and members of the Church, and in the midst of songs. His memory is very pleasant—an ingenuous, cordial, quiet, generous spirit. Such shed an influence which softens the axle of daily life; they make up the charm of our social pleasures; and in their death, there is oftentimes a greater loss to the world than in the far-known event of the exit of the great ones of earth. The Lord ordered up Aaron and Moses to the tops of the mountains to die; and, thank God! our people all die upon the Hills of Hope. J. C. KEENER.

MISS MARY E. NEEL, daughter of Charles Neel and Emeline M. Neel, (formerly Emeline M. Terry,) died June 8th, 1859, from rupture of a blood-vessel from a bronchial affection. She was born in Madison county, Miss., Oct. 31st, 1844. Blessed with pious parents and religious instruction from her childhood was accustomed to pray. She was also a regular attendant at Sabbath-school when her health would permit. Early in the present year she became serious, and anxiously engaged in reading her Bible. Directing his conversation, instructions and prayers, to her conversion, about a week previous to her death, the writer had the satisfaction of seeing her happy in a Savior's love. She exclaimed "I am so happy! I am so happy." She continued in a happy frame of mind, and was much engaged in singing or repeating those hymns and passages with which she was familiar. "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Happy day," "O! that I had wings like a dove," etc. And as she breathed her last, leaning on the arm of an affectionate mother, she expressed her willingness to depart. MRS. SARAH SOPHRONIA, wife of B. F. Swayze, and daughter of Daniel and Eliza K. Farrar, died in Wilkinson Co., Mississippi, on the 29th of May, 1859. The death of this estimable woman has thrown a shadow beyond the home she adorned. In childhood she was distinguished for her modest and gentle spirit. Her mind was quick, her memory retentive, and her acquaintance with books, large and accurate. From very infancy she was familiar with pious deeds; and, while yet upon the lap of a mother, she learned sad song, with a sweetness almost superhuman, some of the beautiful hymns which Tobias Gibson and others who came after him, had mingled with the devotions of the family altar, or the worship of the great congregation, while yet the forest was the temple. Refreshing memories of the charm which made radiant the face of "the child who sang so sweetly," are cherished yet. In the early part of 1858 she attached herself to the Church. In September of that year she professed to have found experimental assurance of her acceptance with God. The earnestness and fidelity of her Christian character thenceforth were apparant, as well to her household as to the Church; and she lived a thoughtful, prayerful, hopeful life. Her death was not to her an unlooked for event. Her apprehensions had fixed the period, and hastening to pronounce the name of the babe that slept upon her bosom, she prepared to depart. Calmly disposing of her children; calmly committing her dying wishes to her husband and friends. In answer to the question, "Does your faith still repose in Christ?" she replied, "Just as strong as ever." And, turning to her husband she said distinctly, "I am going to die." With that joyful resignation which had marked the days of her suffering she waved adieu to the sorrowing friends who wept around her, and departed to be with Christ.

Sunnyside, Mississippi. W. H. WATKINS.

MISS ANN DAVIS, daughter of Mr. Johnson Davis, died at her father's in Wilcox county, Alabama, July 21, in the twenty-third year of her age. She anticipated death with Christian resignation. Hers was a quiet and gentle spirit. Her life was an earnest one, yet cheerful and happy. Her unobtrusive piety commanded the respect and confidence of all around her, throwing a charm over all the relations of life. She was born on the 26th day of September, 1836. She was deprived of a mother's care in early life. She was converted and joined the M. E. Church, South, under the ministry of Rev. J. B. Rabb, August, 1857. She died leaving abundant testimony of her own acceptance, and of her unwavering confidence in the power and efficacy of God's grace to save a world of sinners. Only a few moments before death she spoke of the preciousness of the Saviour's love, and rejoiced in prospect of a home beyond this vale of tears. R. Y. R.

SISTER ELIZABETH ANN LYON, died at the residence of her husband Mr. Jerome Lyon, in Wilcox county, Alabama, June 5, 1859, in the twenty-seventh year of her age. She was born September 20, 1832, was converted and joined the M. E. Church, South, in 1850. The circumstances of her death were truly afflicting, being snatched away suddenly and in the bloom of health. Such had been her Christian course after her conversion, that we have every reason to trust that she has been taken from the evil to come. She leaves a fond husband, four children, one of whom a sweet little babe, an affectionate mother, sister, and brothers to mourn their loss. R. Y. R.

LITTLE RICHARD, infant son of David and Elizabeth Purtis died on Wednesday, July 27, aged thirteen months and a few days, leaving his parents to mourn the loss of their lovely and only child. R. Y. R.

MRS. ELIZABETH HOGD, wife of Rev. J. M. Hood of the Alabama Conference, died June 19th, 1859, in her 24th year. Having the advantage of pious parents—Presbyterians—in the autumn of 1852 found peace in believing in Jesus; and attached herself to the Presbyterian Church; was married to J. M. Hood, January, 1854. He being a Methodist, she cast in her lot with him. Sister Hood, in her life and conversation, evinced to the world, that she regarded consistency as a jewel. A more agreeable, pleasant, and amiable lady we have never seen, as brethren of the Alabama Conference will bear testimony. She had a sweet and generous spirit. She desired to see the will of the Lord in everything. At Selma, in 1857, her husband joined the Alabama Conference, and she in the fullness of her lovely spirit, entered the itinerant field without a murmur. And though a child of affliction, she would not suffer her husband to locate without taking the responsibility upon himself. She bore her affliction with Christian resignation. On Saturday morning, previous to her death, looking her husband, sister, and step-mother in the face, she said: "Do you all know that I am going to die?" "Her husband told her, he hoped not." She continued, "yes I am going to die, going to see sweet little Silas," (her babe then in heaven.) And then commenced and shouted aloud, and requested them to meet her in heaven. Her frequent exhortation was, "live close to God." From that time onward her soul was bathing in an ocean of love. On Sunday morning as she neared Jordan's shore, she was heard to say. "Glory, glory," and about the last was, "Oh! blessed Jesus." She leaves a husband, infant babe, and others to mourn her loss. J. D. STONE.

JOSEPH AGEE was born in Richmond county, North Carolina, May 9th, 1797, and died at his residence, near Shiloah, Marengo county, Alabama, July 3d, 1859. He is enshrined in the hearts of his family, most highly esteemed by his neighbors and friends, and an especial favorite among youth and children; he was most largely possessed of integrity, amiability and hospitality; but, above all, he was a Christian—and a member of the Methodist Church more than thirty years. He was sincere and ardent in devotion, unimpeachable in Christian walk, and energetic as a member of the Church; at his death—he was steward, class-leader and Sunday-school Superintendent. His zeal in the last-mentioned office was especially praiseworthy. He endured his last sickness, which lasted four weeks, with Christian fortitude—not murmuring nor complaining in the least. One day, during his last sickness hearing his little daughter humming a favorite tune, he sang, in an audible voice and with much feeling, "O, the transporting rapturous scene," etc. He gave satisfactory testimony of his readiness to die. His funeral was preached by the writer from Rev. xiv. 13, to a large and weeping audience. The Quarterly Conference of Rembert Hills Circuit, passed resolutions highly complimentary to their deceased brother.

ABRAHAM McGEHEE, died at Pass Christian, July 25th, in the 69th year of his age, and was buried in the family grave-yard of his brother, Judge Edward McGehee, of this county. In all the relations of life he was a man of very marked characteristics. What he did, was done with energy; what he thought, was plainly spoken; what he believed was the law of his living. For many years he was a martyr to a complication of ailments, that filled his days with labor and sorrow. The last months of his life restored him to partial health; and with it came the gentleness, patience and faith of the true Christian. And so he died, having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which he knew was far better than anything that this world had given nr could give. B.

FANNY E., only child of Rev. John B. and Rebecca R. Bowen, aged about eleven months, died on Friday morning, July 22d, 1859. How comforting is the thought that God orders all things for the best. Human nature is prone to rebel against such dispensations as that which has fallen upon our beloved Pastor; and yet we trust he can cheerfully say, "Thy Will, Oh Lord, be done!" Short was the earthly existence that was allotted to his endeared child; but yet it was none the less dear, nor was the stroke the less severe upon the bereaved parents. It had arrived at sufficient age to be felt as a sweet blessing to the household, and its bereavement has left a void that can never be filled until they join the heaveely throng, and meet it again in the abode of the saints in glory. [Homesville Independent.

LOUIS OSCAR TRAYWICK, in his 20th year, died in Monterey Alabama, July 26th, 1859. Louis was a young man of steady habits; regular in his attention to his father's business; affectionate in disposition, and regular in his attendance at Church. The night before he died he called the family, told them he was about to leave them. On being asked if he was ready, he answered promptly, he was. That he would soon be with his sainted mother. Admonished all his relations and friends to meet him in heaven. T. MOODY.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstralion, Cholera or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT.—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores near the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us. J. R. HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,
C. M. STEVENS

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VESEY.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from wor

THEODOSIA ERNEST.

Many of the numerous readers of the Advocate, especially those who have Baptist friends and neighbors, have probably read or heard of the above work. To those who have not, it is sufficient to say that it is a book written for the purpose of sustaining the peculiar views of our Baptist brethren on the subject of baptism and Church government; and emanated from the press of Graves, Marks & Co., Nashville, a year or two since.

Having heard it highly spoken of by many friends of that "faith and order," and having seen it "unconditionally recommended" by their press as a "masterly production," which "has produced a wide-spread enthusiasm," my curiosity was very naturally excited to read the work and judge "if those things were so." The unusual activity of our Baptist friends having placed it within easy reach, I have lately employed some leisure moments in perusing it; a beautifully well-written, but, so far as facts are concerned, totally unreliable, work. And, as many discrepancies exist in it, I would like to suggest, through the columns of the Advocate, the propriety of having it "fixed up" before the lovely heroine is any longer "hailed as the morning star of that brighter day" (Tex. Bap.) or aided with their influence in her sweet and holy labor of converting sinners. No, I am against proselyting the Christian world.

I will adduce a few instances of unreliability, and, as the book itself is the only witness I wish to call upon, the testimony is such that there can be no doubt about it.

It gives, as the reason why the word baptize is not translated immerse, on page 27, "King James would not permit the translators to translate all the words for fear of disturbing the faith and practice of the Church of England."

The same charge is made on page 90: "They were forbidden by King James to change the ecclesiastical words. They must not teach immersion." And the same charge is made on page 85.

Here are direct charges that the version of the Bible, known as King James's, was not fairly translated. They must not teach immersion for fear of disturbing the faith and practice of the Church of England."

Now the reverse of all this is true, and the author could not have been ignorant of the fact; for, on page 78, he gives the year 1643 as the date when sprinkling was substituted for immersion (the Bible was translated in 1611); and, on page 177, he says: "As for sprinkling, properly so called, it was nt 1645 just then beginning, and used by very few."

In the second volume, page 279, he says: "The English Church herself practiced immersion, and immersion only, until comparatively a recent day." And, on the next page he says, "Immersion was not merely the ordinance established by Christ and practiced by the first Churches, but it was noticed and practiced by the Church of England as her ordinary baptism, even towards the close of the last century."

And yet our author does not hesitate to ask such questions as the following, on page 175: "Can it be possible that doctors of divinity will impose such falsehoods on their people in order to sustain the practice of the Church?"

The book also claims the early Christians as Baptists, and yet proves them to have practiced "fooleries" which no Baptist of the present day would tolerate. On page 166 it says: "It was near three hundred years before there were any professed Christians who were not Baptists." The same assertion is repeated on the next page. It says: "I say the Christian Fathers for the first three centuries were Baptists, because these Fathers say so themselves." In support of this position is an extract from Tertullian, who lived about the commencement of the third century, in the following language, page 168: "We renounce the devil and all his pomps and vanities—afterwards we are in the water."

There is a very important omission in this quotation, which rather upsets the claims of our Baptist friends to him. The last sentence properly reads thus, "Afterwards we are three times plunged in the water." And on page 269, second volume, occurs the following quotation from Hippolytus, who lived and wrote in the third century: "The confession was three times repeated, being uttered before each of the three immersions." On page 266, second volume, the same writer is quoted: "After fasting, bathing, exorcism, etc., they were divested of their clothing and immersed in water. Then, after baptism, they go up out of the water—are anointed with oil, signed with the sign of the cross, and clothed in white garments." And on page 335, first volume, is the following language: "You do not believe that there is any Divine authority for signing the baptized with the sign of the cross; yet Tertullian distinctly recognizes this as an existing custom in his day. So he does the giving the newly baptized a mixture of milk and honey, and anointing them with holy oil. The doctrine of baptismal regeneration and of purgatory both date back to or before this early day, as do the observance of some of the feast days, and a vast amount of the most silly mummery of the Romish Church." On the same page we read that, in these early Churches "the candidates for baptism were divested of their clothing, had salt put in their hands, were daubed with the priest's spittle, were clothed in white on coming out of the water, anointed with chrism, walked from the water with a lighted taper in their hands, etc." And, it is expressly added that, "the first we read of these fooleries, they were already in the churches; they had, so far as we know, never been opposed."

And yet, in the face of all this, our author has the—what shall it be called—to use the following language on page 471, second volume: "The first churches, for two hundred and fifty years, did not baptize infants, and were in other things like Baptist Churches. We will dismiss this with the remark of the lovely heroine of faith, on page 331.—"The cause must ho n very weak one which requires such support!"

I will give one more instance of the case with which Theodosia can contradict herself; and, I think it is so remarkable, that I think it must ho apparent to all; even to the sanguine critic, who thinks that "no denomination work of equal ability and value has ever been written in America!"

I place them side by side for easy reference.

"For the first two or three hundred years, the Church remained what Christ intended. It was a body of professed believers. All history accords to its members a character of singular uprightness and purity. But when infants began to be introduced its whole character was changed.—p. 307.	"The first we know of these fooleries, they were already in the Churches; they had, so far as we know, never been opposed, they were there long before we find any trace of infant baptism there.—p. 335.

And on page 266, second volume, we read, "All these fooleries of exorcism, unction and chrism, together with the sign of the cross, which have no scriptural authority, had come into use long before infant baptism." And yet, over the first quotation our friend gets almost frantic, and exclaims on page 309, "The baptism of an infant is a sin—an act of high-handed rebellion against God. I will say more than this—Infant baptism is impure—it is an act of sacrilege!"

Many more such instances might be given, but these are enough to show that the work is written in a partizan spirit, for the sole purpose of advancing the interests of a sect. Its many misrepresentations—by wilful suppression of portions of its quotations, by perversions of history, and by wrong translations—I have neither time nor inclination to notice. They have been freely commented on in a late work.

One instance may be given: on page 88 we find: "Eis means into in Greek as much as into does in English—that is absolute." Yet on page 385, second volume, we have an instance of its use by Christ in the case of "for." Such errors are common and frequent. Perhaps the notice of them may disabuse the author of the error expressed on page 87: "The Baptists do not have to bear up and twist about under a load of error," as do the "Presbyterian or Pedo-baptist theologians."

The divisions of the Christian world are deplored by all who feel an interest in the advance of the gospel; and, while differences of sentiment exist on the subject of religion, as well as on almost every other topic of thought, it becomes all Christians to exercise to the utmost that spirit of charity and love, by which "we know that we have passed from death unto life." Least of all ought we to judge those "who follow not us," since our Lord reproved his disciples for so doing; and, when we see professed followers of Jesus striving to widen the breach which all regret, we should deplore the result as a retrograde step in the advance of Christianity.

The book which we have noticed, as well as its predecessor, "The Iron Wheel," come justly under such a charge. They have been remarkably successful in fomenting strife and engendering ill-will among

"Those that should be Distinct as the waves, yet one as the sea."

A few who have allowed their denominational pride to get the mastery may glory in such productions, but the true Christian will rather rejoice when such occasions of offence have ceased to exist. O.

SCIENCE HILL FEMALE ACADEMY, SHELBYVILLE, KENTUCKY.

This Institution is one of the oldest Protestantnt schools in the valley of the Mississippi, having been founded in March, 1825, and has been continued under the uninterrupted principalship of Rev. and Mrs. J. Tevis, during that entire period. A parallel case is probably not to be found in the history of institutions of learning.

The buildings have not been erected with reference to architectural display, but are peculiarly adapted to the purpose for which they are intended, combining comfort, convenience, and safety. These buildings have been multiplied as the demand increased, until they present now the appearance of a quiet, retired little village, an inviting, comfortable home.

The location is as healthy as can be found in Kentucky; but to the natural advantages it possesses in this regard, is added the most assiduous and watchful supervision over the health of the pupils. It is worthy of notice that during a period of nearly thirty-five years there have occured but seven deaths. Some of these did not transpire in the Institution, and are not to be traced to it. And to many, particularly from the remote South, it has proved the means of improvement and restoration to health.

Library and Apparatus.—The library is judiciously selected, and handsome additions are being made to it every year. The chemical and philosophical apparatus has been increased constantly, as new discoveries and improvements suggested and required. Mr. Robert C. Tevis, a son of the Principal, has just started on a tour to Europe, and within the next few months will have an opportunity of making important additions to this department.

The musical department is now under the control of Professor Knppes, one of the most accomplished teachers in this country. He has at least three assistants, a critical knowledge of the theory of music, and a finished style in performing the objects sought to be secured. Particular attention is paid to the cultivation of voice, not only in solo and choral singing, but in weekly preparation for Church congregational singing, under the immediate direction of Professor Knppes.

Dr. Tevis has charge of the mathematical department, than whom a more competent and successful teacher, a more courteous gentleman, a more consistent Christian, a more devoted Methodist, is not to be found.

The literary department is under the special tuition of Mrs. Tevis, Mrs. Kappes, Miss Bunker, Miss Moses, Miss Baldwin, whose reputation as elegant ladies and accomplished teachers is well established.

The commencement exercises were, if possible, the most interesting ever had at Science Hill, and were attended by a vast concourse of visitors from almost every portion of the South and South-west.

The annual address was delivered by Bishop Kavanaugh, and was characteristic. The Bishop gave a fine address, but assured us he had a much better one in his pocket.

The graduating class of 1859, acquitted themselves with distinction, and have left the Institution with as much credit as any that preceded them.

The entire examination was perfectly satisfactory to all concerned, and Science Hill continues to be, what its friends have always found it, a public blessing; an ornament to the Church; the repository of accurate and extensive learning; the nursery of virtue, morality, and religion. H. Linn.

DR. D. N. LORD ON THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD.

ANOTHER DEVELOPMENT OF CALVINISM.

Mr. Editor: I have just read an article in the Theological and Literary Journal, owned and edited by Dr. D. N. Lord, on "The Conversion of the World.

It purports to be a review of Harris' Great Commission. Its spirit is as bitter as Calvinism dares to be at this day. The provocation to this is, ostensibly, the fact that Harris has made some unpleasant allusions to Millenarians in his book. The whole theory of the Great Commission is repudiated and denounced, with a bitterness and variety of objurgation that is amazing. Yet the head and front of its offending is the fact, that it teaches that God's design is to convert the world by the gospel, through the instrumentality of the Church.

This, Dr. Lord flatly denies! His theory is, that the Savior intended the conversion of comparatively a small number—"an election"—under the present dispensation; that the world is to go on increasing in wickedness—the Church being involved in it—until Christ's second coming. He is then to destroy his enemies with a dreadful overthrow, and convert irresistibly the elect! Who, and how many they will be, is not stated.

As I went on with the article, I was wondering what had given rise to such a theory, for I knew the Bible had not; when lo! it leaks out that Calvinism is at the bottom of it! The exigencies of that needy system demanded this blow at the gospel of Christ and the hopes of the world. "O, Wheel!" The reader may wonder whether the author attempted to keep his theory in countenance by any allusions to the Bible. Yes, he does; he quotes the seventh chapter of Daniel, the twelfth and thirteenth chapters of Revelations, and alludes to the twenty-fourth of Matthew, etc.

Dr. Lord claims that this is the theory of the "Millenarians."

Mr. Editor pray tell us why it is that nearly all those who attemp the interpretation of prophesy are destitute of common sense. Is this an effect or the cause of such labors. M. Moore.

DR. CLARKE'S LIFE.

Mr. Editor: Allow me to say through your columns that I have just read with real pleasure, and, I trust, also with profit, the new life of Dr. Adam Clarke, by Dr. Ethridge. The biographer is a gentleman of large attainments and broad views, eminently qualified for the task, to which he has done ample justice.

I commend this work most heartily to all ministers and intelligent laymen. Dr. Clarke's life and labors are a standing rebuke to all our ease-loving and indolence; and ought to be studied frequently and carefully. O, when will the earth see another such class of men as the early Methodist preachers!

There is one circumstance in the history of this great and good man, which needs apology or explanation:—one of his sons became a minister in the Church of England, and, so far as we are advised, without any protest from him. How he could reconcile this with his sense of responsibility to God we cannot understand.

Of Methodism, he says, "From a long and thorough knowledge of the subject, I am led most conscientiously to conclude that Christianity, as existing among those called Wesleyan Methodists, is the purest, safest, and that which is most to the glory of God and the benefit of man, and that, both as to the creed there professed, the form of discipline there established, and the consequent moral practice there vindicated."

And yet, for the sake of position and profit—so it seems to us, with the lights we have—his son is permitted to seek a position in that mongrel Establishment!

But Dr. Clarke was not the only Wesleyan in this condemnation. Dr. Thos. Jackson, if we are not mistaken, has a son in the same compromised situation. Thus, while churchmen find it necessary to come out from the Establishment and seek the aid of Methodism in order to save their souls, the children of Methodism are allowed to think that it is compatible with their eternal safety, to hide their light and curtail their usefulness by seeking a share of its loaves and fishes!

Into what glaring inconsistencies will parental fondness betray good men! In spite of this, error, Dr. C. was a great and good man—whose one great business was to serve his Master and do good. J. Hamilton.

KIRWAN AMONG THE PROPHETS.

"Kirwan" writes a great deal, and sometimes, like other prolific writers, gets beyond his sphere of knowledge. In a recent letter to the Observer, he suggests that if we Methodists will abandon our itinerancy and settle our preachers, the change will do more good than all our camp meetings." Moreover, the Reverend Doctor predicts that sooner or later we will do according to this advice, inasmuch as our preachers are now becoming sufficiently educated to find matter for sermons for any desirable duration of their pastorate—previous inability to do this seeming, to Dr. Murray's comprehension, to be the only true foundation of the itinerant system. He thinks that our preachers, heretofore, have traveled only because being shallow they soon ran dry.

However much, in other respects, Methodist preachers may resemble bees, it is evident that their swarm cannot be "settled" by the beating of tin-pans and culinary brass, or they would have been hived long ago, and Kirwan would have been saved the trouble of adding his tintinnabulation to the unprofitable discord. The Methodists left the old English apiary because the hives were so full of drones and bee-bread that there was no room for workers and honey. They were a little swarm, but they were pursued by a crowd of zealous domestics, beating Establishment, from the font and chalice to the crosier with all their might upon every sounding utensil of the end candlestick. Yet they would not "settle." It is reported even that a ringed hand, tattooing on a miter, tried to inveigle the Queen bee into an episcopal cell, and it is certain that the Prince of the power of the air, thundering in the upper spheres, shook down a shower of cold water to damp the wings and cool the ardor of the excited emigrants. For it is a fact in religious meteorology that there lungs over national churchdom a cold, thin stratum of rarified ecclesiasticism where ascending piety condenses into fog, and chilled devotion, amid on its way to heaven, rests like a cloud over the face of God. A region whence arrested prayer brings back to the pained conscience a lethal baptism from the high places of the Church, instead of living water from the throne of heaven. A region whence distill as from the roof of a cavern the petrifying drops that can turn the heart to stone and case the warm man in a smooth and glittering shell—and fill God's house with stalactites—that grow only as they gather stone, and shine only as they accomplish hardness. But neither confused, nor allured, nor chilled, the swarm swarmed on, and found hives in the fields and forests where God gave them their place to work. And now, while busy at it, ever and anon some lover of "order," or custodian of empty hives, will seize a bread-pan or ten-kettle and drum to them an invitation to "settle." Such drummers are mistaken, Dr. Murray. Our preachers are not seeking homes, they are seeking honey.

Now, it seems never to have entered into Kirwan's imagination, while writing this article, that outside of cities are rural souls to be saved, and that inside of cities, beyond the well-clad and sober-minded congregations who fill the pews of commodious Churches, there are multitudes of men and women who must be sought out and preached to if ever they are to be reached by the Gospel. Kirwan has the notion that the army of Jesus is to do only garrison duty in well-affected places. People, under his system, are first to be converted, and form a congregation, and build a Church, and then send for a pastor.

The bean ideal of a minister with Kirwan and many others of his school, is a good man, well versed in theology, shepherding an orderly, wool-bearing, and prolific flock. He does not remember that the world is peopled by goats, not sheep, and that the goats have neither will nor power to transform themselves into the better nature. Men must be enlightened and converted. Churches must be won out of the kingdom of Satan. The clergy are sent to invade an enemy's country, not to occupy and govern their own. Under the settled pastorate little increase can be expected beyond the natural increase of the sheep. The children of pious people may grow up in piety, but in the mean time the kids outside are growing into goats.—Baltimore Christian Advocate.

HORACE MANN.

Years agone, when he was assiduously and successfully engaged in efforts to forward the educational interests of the country, and have the benefits of education scattered broadcast over the whole land, we know Horace Mann well, and have now tea or a dozen volumes of excellent reading matter, which we prize the more, because they were presented us by him. Then, he was almost universally respected, popular and beloved. A few years later, in an evil hour (as we think,) he suffered his friends to lead him into the arena of political partisan strife, and soon, to a very great extent, "the glory had departed." He was never fitted for that sort of work and ought never to have engaged in it. After a time, he again turned his attention to educational operations, but evidently without riddling his brain of some of the political agrarianism he had imbibed, and, for several years, was active in carrying on a school under the recognition of a principle, which, if generally adopted, and fully carried out, would prove highly detrimental to, if not entirely subversive of, all the true interests of healthful mental and moral culture. The teacher was, to a considerable extent, lost in the politician. He was of that caste of mind that does what it does with all its might, and, having once become deeply imbued with political principles as deceptive as they are dangerous, he was never after rid of them; and, although the school was numerously attended, and very popular, the full fruits thereof are yet to be seen. Here, and in this work, Mr. Mann continued, laboring industriously until the second day of the present month, when he at once "ceased to work and live."—St. Louis Advocate.

SKETCH OF JONATHAN EDWARDS.

Edwards, as may be gathered from the sketch of him thus far, had the main requisites for a powerful preacher. He took great pains in the composing of his sermons, devoting more time to them than other preachers. He wrote them out in full, though he was not wholly confined to what he had written in the delivery. His great acquaintance with the Bible, and with theology, and his great clearness of thought, enabled him skillfully to handle every subject that he treated. When he dwelt on those truths which were most controverted—which he often did, he would set them in an easy and clear light: every sentiment, as he passed from step to step, would drop from his lips with a clear evidence of Scripture and reason, so as to force the assent of the hearer.

But his power as a preacher came much from his great acquaintance with his own heart, and his consequent insight into human nature. His appearance in the pulpit was simple and graceful; his delivery easy, natural and solemn. His voice was not strong, but he spoke with such clearness and precision, his ideas were so plain and striking, that few speakers could so well command attention. Without much noise or gesture, there was such an inward fervor in his words that they came to the mind with great force. The greatest defect of his sermons was the carelessness of his style, by which he allowed a redundancy of words, and oftentimes a looseness of expression. In many instances, one half the number of words would have conveyed the idea as clearly, and produced double the effect.

Less than almost any other minister was he entangled with the affairs of this life; he left them so much to his wife that he knew less of them than his neighbors did. He seldom knew how many cows he had, and whence their forage came, nor how his own table was supplied. It was not the custom to visit his people, except when sent for to visit the sick, or when some were in special affliction. But this was not because he did not think visiting to be an important part of the minister's work. But he thought that ministers should consult their own aptitudes, and employ them in the way which promised most good. He observed that some had a talent for entertaining and profiting discourse in visits, but was conscious that he had not. He was not able in a moment to enter into easy and free conversation, and turn it to what topic he pleased, without the help and even in spite of others. He therefore concluded that his visits must be in a great degree, unprofitable; and that he could benefit his people more by another employment of his time. But his study was always open, and often resorted to for conversation with those under serious impressions. In times of revival, it was thronged with such visitors. And he was a skillful guide to inquirers—not only of his own people, but others coming scores of miles to inquire of him.

His great experience and success in revivals led ministers and people from all parts of New England to look to him for aid. He was called to preach in many places, and had many more such calls than he could comply with. Living in the time of what was called the great awakening, a cotemporary with Whitefield, he saw many ministers and people ready to run wild, either in opposing the work of God, or corrupting it by extravagance. In this view, his preaching and writings were of immense value. This exigency called out his work, entitled, "Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New England," and his "Treatise on Religious Affections"—probably the best work ever written on that subject—setting the distinction between true and false religion in a most clear light. Recorder.

THE PAPAL DOMIMIONS.

One of the conditions of the new concord between the Emperors of Austria and of France is that the temporal authority of the Pope is to be maintained. It is not clear what reforms they may not require of him, in the administration of his States, or what degree of accession in temporal authority, he is to have by being the head of an Italian Confederation, but it is obvious that a cardinal part of their policy is that the Pope shall continue to be the sovereign, in fact, of an Italian State, as well as the spiritual Head of the Church. Considered in the light of the national law, as understood among the States of Europe, the Pope is as legitimately monarch of his States, as any King or Emperor. It is more than eleven hundred years since the foundation was laid of the title of the Popes to their temporal possessions. Before Charlemagne was, and before there was a Germnn Empire, the King of the Franks—Pepin the Little—won the provinces and cities, which now compose in part the Papal territory, of Ravenna, Forli, Fronsinone, Velletrie, and Rieti, from the warlike Lombards, and bestowed them on the Holy See. Charlemagne, the grand-son of Pepin, enlarged this domain, by the addition of Spoleto and Perugia, the scene of the late shocking excesses by the Swiss troops in the service of the papacy. Benevento was given to the Popedom by the Emperor Henry III. in 1053.

The territories on the Mediterancan side, which constitute what is called the Patrimony of St. Peter, were given to the Popedom in the 12th century, by the Margravine Matilda, of Tuscany. The city of Rome, with the adjoining territary, was acquired by the gift of the Emperor Rudolph, in 1278. Bolognu, Ferrurra, and other provinces on the Adriatic side, were obtained afterwards; but no part of the Papal territory thus acquired was ever alienated, except the city of Avignoa, and a part of Provence, now in France, which the French took in 1790, and kept. The Papal territory has thus been the gradual growth, by gift and by purchase, of more than a thousand years, and its temporal titles are as good in national law as that of any other government. They are older, in fact, than those of most of the empires of Europe, to their own principal possessions, having existed before there was an empire of Germany or of Austria, or a Kingdom of Prussia, or a British title to any thing in Europe but half of the Island of Great Britain. Whether it is wise, or happy, for the Papacy or its subjects, that this should be so, or should he continued to be so, is another question altogether.

The temporal authority of the Pope in these States shared the fate, during the wars of the French revolution, of other powers and States which encountered Napoleon. After taking portions of the dominions of the Church to make fresh Republics, and then new Kingdoms, the whole was incorporated into the Empire of France, and the Pope himself conducted to Paris, established as French Pensioner, at Fountainbleau. The battle of Waterloo, and the treaties of Vienna, re-established the Popedom in its former temporal authority, as it did many other Governments which Napoleon had overthrown.

The form of government, as our readers know, is an elective monarchy. The Pope is chosen by the college of cardinals, whose number is fixed at seventy. His powers are nearly unlimited, and the entire administration is ecclesiastical. Every department of government is under the direction of a cardinal, and the local Government of each of the twenty-one provinces or districts, (called marks, legations, and delegations,) is under the control of a cardinal, with the assistance of a council named by the Pope. In some delegations the temporal nobility are allowed political influence, but their authority must emanate from the Pope. It is not our purpose here, to recite the manifold causes of complaint which make the lower orders of the Roman people—that is, the orders which are not privileged as clerical or noble—so discontented with the Papal Government, that a foreign army has been required for years, to prevent them from breaking out into insurrection.

With the history of this roiguing pope, Pius IX, our readers are doubtless familiar. He was born in 1792, at Sinigaglia, and when elected Pope, in 1846, was Joseph Maria, Count Mastai Ferreti, Archbishop of Imola. He is now 68 years of age, and has been Pope thirteen years. He commenced his career by instituting various reforms and giving countenance to liberal principles. But the assassination of Count Rossi, the republican outbreake under the stimulation of Muzzini, and revolution stirred up in 1848, drove him from his palace and from Rome, and the establishment of a Roman republic threw him into the arms of the reactionists. The French army bombarded Rome, destroyed the republic, and carried the Pope back in triumph in 1850, since which he has been protected by foreign arms, and constrained to go along with the supporters of the most absolute rule.

What he will do, and what he will be permitted to do, as President of an Italian Confederation, are for the future to develope. He is a thoroughly pure and conscientiously devout man, but he is not remarkable for decision of character or high intellectual capacity. His extreme age will most probably make him rather a passive agent in the hands of stirrer men.—Picayune.

MYSTERIES OF THE NIGHT.

There is nothing very odd in my feeling nervous when I happen to lie awake and get listening for sounds. Just keep your eyes open any time after midnight, when you are lying in bed in a lone attic of a dark night. What horrid, strange, suggestive, unaccountable noises you will hear! The stillness of night is a vulgar error. All the dead things seem to be alive. Crack! That is the old chest of drawers; you never hear it crack in the daytime. Crack! There's a door ajar; you know you shut them all. Where can that latch be that rattles so? Is anybody trying it softly? Worse than anybody, is ——? (Cold shiver.) Then a sudden gust that jars all the windows—very strange! there does not seem to be any wind about that it belongs to. When it stops you hear the worms boring in the powdery beams overhead. Then steps outside—a stray animal, no doubt. All right; but a gentle moisture breaks out all over you; and then something like a whistle or a cry; another gust of wind, perhaps; that accounts for the rustling that made your heart roll over and tumble about, so that it felt more like a live rat under you than a part of your own body; then a crash of something that has fallen—blown over, very like —— Pater noster, qui es in calis! for you are damp and cold, and sitting upright, and the bed trembling so that the death-watch is frightened and has stopped ticking!

No; night is an awful time for strange noises and secret doings. Who ever dreamed, till one of our sleepless neighbors told us of it, of that Walpurgis gathering of birds and beasts of prey, foxes, and owls, and crows, and eagles, that come from all the country round, on moonshiny nights, to crunch the clams and muscles, and pick out the eyes of dead fishes that the storm had thrown on Chelsea beach? Our old mother nature has pleasant and cheery tones enough for us, when she comes to us in her dress of blue and gold over the Eastern hilltops; but when she follows as up-stairs to our beds, in her suit of black velvet and diamonds, every creak of her sandals and every whisper of her lips is full of mystery and fear. Atlantic Monthly.

A SERMON OF THE REVOLUTION.

The following sermon was preached on the eve of the battle of Brandywine, September 10, 1779, by Rev. Jonb Trout, before a large portion of the American army, Gen. Washington, Gen. Wayne, and other leading officers being present. It is difficult to read its stirring words without feeling the blood tingling in one's veins:

"Soldiers, I look around upon your familiar faces with strange interest. To-morrow we will go forth to the battle; for need I tell you that your unworthy minister will march with you, invoking God's aid in the fight? We will march forth to battle! Need I exhort you to fight the good fight; to fight for your homesteads, your wives and children?

"My friends, I might urge you to fight by the galling memories of British wrong. Walton, I might tell you of your father butchered in the silence of night on the plains of Trenton; I might picture his gray hairs dabbled in blood; I might ring his death-shriek in your ears!

"Shelmire, I might tell you of a butchered mother; the lonely farm-house, the night assault, the roof in flames, the shouts of the troopers as they dispatched their victims; the cries for mercy, the pleadings of innocence for pity. I might paint all this again in the vivid colors of the terrible reality, if I thought your courage needed such wild excitement.

"But I know you are strong in the might of the Lord. You will march forth to battle on the morrow with light hearts and determined spirits, though the solemn duty, the duty of avenging the dead, may rest heavy on your souls.

"And in the hour of battle, when all around the darkness is lit by the lurid cannon-glare and the piercing musket-flash, when the wounded strew the ground and the dead litter your path, then remember, soldiers, that God is with you! The eternal God fights for you! He rides on the battle-cloud; he sweeps onward with the march of the hurricane-charge! God, the awful and the infinite, fights for you and will triumph!"

CELEBRATION OF THE TERCENTENARY OF THE REFORMATION.

The Jubilee has been celebrated in France with much unanimity and in an excellent spirit by all denominations of Protestants. Everywhere there was a great concourse of worshipers. The festival at Nismes, celebrated on the 26th, was extremely touching. It took place in the "Desert," as in times of yore when the Church was under the cross. But it was not persecution which to-day forced the Protestants to seek a place of meeting there, but the wish to bring back old remembrances and emotions, together with the impossibility of finding in the town an edifice to contain the thousands of bearers.

The vast area was filled, and the hills around were covered with spectators. Pastor Bussion, of Lyons, delivered a most affecting address, after which the Lord's Supper was administered. The Roman Catholic population acted with respectful reserve, and all passed off in perfect order.

At Fernoy, near Genova, had on account of this neighborhood, the Jubilee was celebrated in a very touching manner; the "venerable company of pastors," and the consistory of Geneva, sent deputations, and the French students in theology came in a mass. Great, then, is the difference between 1759 and 1859!

We hope for greater things yet; the barriers lately standing between the Gospel and innumerable populations, such as China and Japan, are falling. Lombardy and Tuscany are opening their gates to the glad tidings. The Pope has no longer power to burn any one for religion; his spiritual sovereignty is not even able to afford a shelter for his temporal sovereignty! He is kept a prisoner by our bayonets, and we may say of him what, fifty years ago, in July, 1809, was acted down on a registor by a gendarme, who had received one of his predecessors in the Convent of Mont Cenis, then used as barracks: "Received, a Pope in a rather bad state."

LETTER FROM BISHOP JANES IN RELATION TO THE DISTURBANCE IN TEXAS.

Mr. Editor:—I am unaccustomed to publish incidents in which I am personally concerned. In my late visit to Texas an occurrence transpired, relating to others as well as myself, which I deem of public interest, as it is violative of the Constitution of the United States, which expressly ordains that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States," and also of the sacred rights of speech and of conscience. Two annual Conferences, as well as numerous individuals, have requested me to give a statement of the transaction. Those whose judgment ought to be potential on any question of the kind advise me to do so.

The Arkansas Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church met at Timber Creek, Fannin County, Texas, on the 11th day of last March. The Conference proceeded with its business pleasantly until Saturday evening, at which time the Conference, being small, had so nearly finished its work that we might have adjourned sine die without inconvenience. But the brethren felt that it would be pleasent to retain their Conference association over the Sabbath, and therefore adjourned to meet at six o'clock on Monday morning. This early hour was fixed upon because the brethren, most of whom came on horseback, desired to make a full day's ride on their return journey. I had also engaged a conveyance to take me to Sherman, about thirty miles, where I desired to take the overland mail stage on Tuesday, on my way to New York.

Soon after I reached my lodging, some brethren came in and informed me that a public meeting had that afternoon been held in the court-house at Bonham, about three miles from the seat of the Conference, that very inflammatory speeches had been made, that great excitement had been created, and that they were coming the next day to drive us off, etc. I advised them to be careful not to give any just cause of offence, and prayerfully await the hour, and religiously meet its responsibilities. Appreciating my position as President of the Conference, I fait for myself but one anxiety, that was to do right,—to fully meet my obligations to all parties and interests concerned. A social meeting had been appointed for nine o'clock on Sunday morning. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was to be administered as a part of the service. It was announced that I would preach at eleven o'clock and at the close of the sermon ordain the deacons. Only one person had been elected to elder's order, and he had been ordained on Friday. At the appointed hour all the ministers and most of the members in the place were present, and united in the exercises of a social meeting. The speaking of the brethren and elders was intelligent and spiritual. A very devotional spirit was manifest. Near the close of the service the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered, and the members of our Church, and the members of other Churches present, generally partook of it. At eleven o'clock I commenced the more public services. The house was not full, though, for the place, the audience was good in point of numbers; in my opinion not as large as it would have been but for the apprehension of disturbance and perhaps violence. While reading the Scripture lesson, I accidentally lifted my eyes in the direction of a window, and saw the mob approaching the Church. They were mounted on horseback, and marching with considerable regularity, as I judge from the momentary side glance I had of them, in pintoons of from three to five.

The Bonham paper states their number to have been about two hundred. I think most of them were armed. The revolvers and bowie knives of some of them were exposed, as I was informed.

During prayer they gathered around the Church. While closing the second hymn, as many as could crowded into the Church. At the close of the singing I commenced giving out my text. At the same time their "spokesman," as he termed himself, standing about half way up the aisle, said, "Do I address the bishop?" I made no reply but continued, giving out my text. His repeated, "Do I address the bishop?" I then replied, "I am a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church." He then said, "I have an unpleasant duty to perform, and I presume it will be equally unpleasant to you." He then described the meeting at Bonham the previous day; when, looking round upon his associates, and pointing me to them, he said:—"This large and respectable committee was appointed to wait upon you and the Conference, and make known to you the determination of the meeting." He then called upon one of his company to read to us the resolutions adopted by the meeting. The following is the report of the meeting and resolutions referred to:

From the Bonham [Texas] Independent, March 19, 1859.

"At a meeting of the citizens of Fannin, held at the Court House in Bonham, on Saturday the 12th instant:

On motion, Dr. Hoffar was called to the Chair, and John M. Crane, appointed Secretary.

On motion, Gen. Green was called on to state the object of the meeting. He stated that an organization known as the Northern Methodists existed in this country—that it was gradually increasing in strength by accessions of members and preachers from the Northern States, and was becoming so strong as to endanger the security of our slave property—that the avowed object of this Church was the extirpation of slavery, and that their organizations were but so many agencies from the North designing its ultimate abolition among us, and in proof of the ground assumed towards slavery, he called on Dr. Dalisle to read a series of resolutions from official documents of the Maine Conferences of the Northern Methodist Church, that were adopted at their annual meetings in 1858. The first series of resolutions were adopted by the Maine Conference, and the second by the East Maine Conference.

Geo. Green then proceeded by stating that one of the preachers of this denomination (Joe Logsdon) on hearing these resolutions read on the street, publicly proclaimed his endorsement of every article, and further, "that they could not be engaged in putting down a greater evil." He stated that the citizens felt insulted and outraged by such proceeding, and had assembled to take measures for the removal of this nuisance from this county.

Judge Sam. A. Roberts being called for, came forward. He was astonished at finding an association of men in our midst professing such sentiments. He could not have heard one of them endorsing such resolutions without striking him to the ground—he felt satisfied, from the resolutions passed by their different Conferences at the North, what the sentiments of their Church were—that they differed from the M. E. C., South, only on the slavery question, and that this organization, coming here from the North, and presided over by Northern men, must necessarily be endeavoring to carry out the same ends as the Church North, and hence should not be tolerated by the people—he further stated that he never was in favor of Mob Law, but it was necessary that the people should take some decisive measures—let them act mildly but firmly.

R. P. Tarleton then moved that a committee of three be appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sentiments of this meeting and of the citizens generally. The motion was carried, and the following gentlemen appointed by the Chairman: Gen. Green, Judge Roberts and John M. Crane.

During the absence of the Committee, Wm. M. Wood, Esq., was called for and came forward. He entered into a discussion of the feelings of the abolitionists towards the slave-holding portion of the South, and their utter disregard for all law when intervening between them and the prospects of their abolition schemes—he enlarged on their conduct towards the Southern people in the late Kansas war, and mentioned some thrilling instances that came under his personal observation as a participator in that struggle; and closed by urging the people to adopt decisive measures towards those in this county, and drive them from our borders.

L. C. Delisle spoke next, and after reading several of the resolutions adopted by the N. M. C.—devoted a short time to a lucid exposition of the policy pursued by the Northern Abolition Societies in sending their "wolves in sheep's clothing" among us, professing to preach the Gospel, but in reality, to spread abolition documents among the people, and endeavor to abolitionize the country—all their operations were carried on in the "underground railroad system," that if we waited to catch them in the overt act, we would wait until it was too late, as did the people of South Carolina and Virginia, before the fearful negro insurrections that took place in portions of those States, instigated by the emissaries of Northern abolition societies. He believed those to be our midst to be but spies and forerunners of the invading army of abolitionism, and mentioned the peace and safety that resulted to the people of Marion county, Mo., from routing just such a nest that had organized in their midst.

Dr. P. Dakin next came forward, commented on the resolutions that had been read, and thought that the time had come when it was necessary that the people in self-protection should put down such organizations, henceforth and forever.

S. D. Rainey, Esq., was loudly called for and came forward—he endorsed all that had been said on the subject—he believed they were derogatory to our best interests and that they were exerting an influence that had better be nipped in the bud, or it would yet cause us trouble.

Dr. Reed, on being called for, stated that he heartily endorsed all said on the subject by the speakers that had preceded him, and for his own part, would not feel contented with anything short of placing the entire organization across Red River.

B. F. Christian was next called for, and came forward and strongly advocated the policy of immediate and decisive action against the organization.

The committee appointed to draft resolutions now returned, and the chairman presented the following resolutions, which were adopted unanimously:

Whereas, A secret foe lurks in our midst, known as the Northern Methodist Church, entertaining sentiments antagonistic to the institution of Slavery, and the manifest intention of whose Northern conductors is to do away with Slavery in these United States; and

Whereas, The further growth of this enemy would be likely to endanger the perpetuity of that institution in Texas; and

Whereas, Sentiments diametrically opposed to the interests of the South have this day been publicly proclaimed upon our streets by a Minister of said Northern Methodist Church: therefore be it

Resolved, That the Methodist Church having separated into two divisions, North and South, the organization of a Northern branch of that Church in our midst, as a screen behind which to hide the emissaries of a Northern political faction, known as abolitionists, is dangerous to our interests, and ought

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

[illegible] of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should [illegible] to the same time.

[illegible] new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will [illegible] and quarters dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Dollars a year.

[illegible] subscribers will know, without being informed, that the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription.

[illegible] having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the acquaintance of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our friends will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its evils, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

"SHE WAS A GOOD WOMAN!"

Not long since, an unexpected letter came from an old and valued friend, from whom no direct intelligence had been received within a year or two, saying that his wife, after a sudden illness, "slept quietly and peacefully, until the spirit was gently withdrawn, leaving not a trace of agony, but a countenance as sweet as that of a sleeping angel." It was not permitted her to say parting words of assurance and blessing. These, though unspeakably precious to memory, are, nevertheless, not so precious, by far, as the happy memories that throng the pathway of sunshine along which her [illegible] has traveled—memories of a sweet [illegible] spirit—of congenial and parental love—of the rarest christian culture of her children—of the heavenly influence of deep personal piety, in her own charming home, in the fellowship of the Church, in all the quiet ways of a happy and useful life. No doubt of her eternal reward adds a pang to the grief of the bereaved ones, akin to that of those who were her friends; because, "she was a good woman!"

She was good, as woman is naturally good, when unperverted. And this goodness cannot be too highly appreciated. It is a blessing of incalculable value to man. Woman—always, as a rule, good and beautiful—is the balm of life amid the rude toils and wasting cares of the world. But she was a good woman in a much higher sense. She was a christian. Strange that any woman is not a christian. "Her delight was in the law of the Lord, and in his law she meditated day and night." The sanctuary was a sweet and familiar place to her. She dwelt in the fellowship of "the house of the Lord all the days of her life, to see the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple."

A good woman! Between Eden and Paradise, there is [illegible] more beautiful and lovely ideal of human excellence than that pictured in these sweet words—a good woman! The most precious memories are those which turn to that beautiful star in the solemn and quiet firmament of the past—"a good woman"—"my mother!" Most of the men who have acquired sufficient strength of character to stem the evil currents, and buffet the threatening waves, of this [illegible]—the men who have overcome temptations and [illegible], poverty and toil, disappointment and sorrow—have received their principal power from the mothers who bore them, and nursed their infant years. Moses became the heir apparent of the throne of Egypt, and afterward rose to the higher honor of being chosen of God as the leader and lawgiver of his people; but his anxious mother wove the ark of bulrushes which bore the tender babe above the waters of the Nile, and protected him from the devouring teeth of the floating monsters of the flood. The self-reliant, learned man, however strong he may have become, was sent forth in tender years, from the nursing arms and soft breast of a loving-hearted mother, whose soul was as sympathetically responsive to the wants of his spirit as was her bosom to those of his body. O the beauty and the blessing of mother-hood! Who shall sing its praise in adequately noble verse, or chisel forth in daring marble the perfect symbol of its glory!

And the most intense, profound, and sacred affections and joys of which manhood is susceptible—which invest the earthly pilgrimage of man with its sweetest and most enduring charm—are all inspired by the same power—that of a good woman—"my wife!" The blessing of a [illegible] love comes to manhood, in the ordination of God as the complement and crown of the love of his mother received in childhood. Short of that "fullness of joy" in the presence of God, and those "pleasures forevermore" at his right hand, there is nothing more precious than the pure heart-love of a wife for the man who is her husband. Life only has beauty and joy—it only promises good and glory—it is only kept from being converted into the ante-chamber of hell—it only becomes the home of the heavenly life—because it is blest with the [illegible] and love of good women—mothers, wives, sisters, daughters, and women-friends.

How often, in published obituaries of departed women, is it said: "She was a good woman!" At mention of such a one, what a full-orbed circle of happy thoughts, and sweet words, and angelic looks, and softly-musical tones of voice, and beautiful smiles and tears, rise upon the mental vision of the mind, like the glorious sun, "with his whole round of rays complete," when he first blesses a dark and waiting world with his smile of joy! A good woman in a family living, is a treasure of exceeding worth; but when that treasure is deposited in heaven, in the keeping of God, forever secure from loss or depreciation, it then begins to yield its largest benefit and blessing.

HEARING SERMONS.

A few Sabbaths since, as we sat in Church, listening to an earnest and, in itself, a most impressive sermon, we felt into a musing frame of mind and these were our musings.

First: Our preacher is evidently doing his duty. Now, be it understood, that pulpit-duty is something more than duty in the pulpit. The smallest part of a preacher's work, if we except the art of genuine and effective delivery, is performed in the pulpit. A subject must be "thought out," must be meditated, must be furnished with its salient points, before it is brought into the sacred desk, or it cannot be properly handled.

This is too clear to require argument. But some [illegible] enough to forget it. They go into battle with empty cartridge-boxes, and when the fighting begins they go through the motions, but discharge no balls. Our preacher, however, is not one of these improvident men. He gets ready beforehand. Facts, arguments, illustrations, the whole mental equipment, he is provided with, and hence, in the pulpit, he has this [illegible] to contend with, viz: he has nothing to do but use his powers.

Secondly: The congregation is not doing its duty. Some of the most are not. Hearing the word is an art, [illegible] an art. Indeed, it is a divine art. And we suspect that the congregation is not aware what an art hearing is. Let us say, then, that it is an art that requires a previous preparation. And this preparation is two-fold, viz: intellectual and spiritual. Every hearer should get his faculties aroused, wide-awake, and active, before coming to Church. To do this, read some stirring [illegible], and especially read the Bible. If you come to Church with your mind weak and weary from the business of the week, you cannot be much benefitted. Sermons lose much of their power because of this negligence. Go to hear the word in a receptive mood. Then, too, the spiritual preparation. To go to religious service without previous prayer, is little else than mockery. The heathen always made the aid of the feelings, and never so much so as in listening to a sermon. But these feelings cannot be awakened unless we pray at home, for God has ordained that the deepest feelings in religious life should have their birth in the closet, and no where else. You see then the necessity for preparation. If a minister ought to prepare to preach, his people ought to prepare to hear.

But the hearing-art is much more than preparation. It is the art of taking in. Now to take in, you must have an appetite; you must hunger for the truth; you must thirst for the water of life eternal. Eating and drinking where you have neither appetite nor thirst, are almost medicinal in their unpleasantness. So you see where the power to take in begins. But another point: the art of taking in requires interest, attention and solicitude. Hearing a sermon is one of the privileges of life. Hearing a good sermon is one of the joys of life. Every Christian can remember sermons that have been eras in his earthly history. And there would be more of these wonderful eras, if we heard sermons with interest, attention and solicitude. No man can tell what kind of a sermon God intends to make a great blessing to his soul. It may come from a most unexpected source, and hence, this is our duty, viz: to be always ready for the Spirit's visits. If this Spirit comes to your soul and finds it—not at home, then you have lost, and how much, none may tell. But observation has satisfied us of this fact, that in the case of the large majority of hearers, their souls are robbed—their lives are robbed of very much of their beauty and power, by the cold and often callous manner in which they listen to the gospel.

Last of all, we observe, and most important of all, hearing involves the conscience. We must account to God for what we hear, and—mark this truth—not only for the actual good a sermon yields us, but for all the possible good it might have yielded us, had we been more earnest, more sympathetic, more devout, in listening to its solemn message. Now, it is just here that God lays the emphasis of his great warning and tells us—"Beware!" The foundation of neglected duties, as those duties address us in the week, is generally laid in the neglect of Sabbath-sermons. Sunday is the shield of the week.

Preaching is the best preparation for the trials of business and the temptations of social life, during the days we give to toil and intercourse. Never forget this. If we open our hearts to the blessing of God's word on the Sabbath, it is almost certain that they will remain open to God's blessing all the days of the week. And sure we are that God rarely attends the other "means of grace" with his presence and power, if the preaching of the word is not appreciated as his appointed instrument to save the soul.

GREAT MEN AND MOUNTAINS.

The Rev. Dr. Adams in his funeral discourse on the death of the Hon. Rufus Choate, says: "Great men are special efforts of that same divine benevolence which gives us Apennines and Alps and Lebanons and Himlayas.

"A man of genius is therefore a proper occasion of special praise to God for His sovereign power and goodness. Men seldom think of this. They worship and serve the creature more than the Creator, who is ever all, God blessed forever."

We like these sentiments. We heartily endorse them. If their spirit and meaning were fully felt in our souls and lives, common men would become less common, and great men would become greater.

Great men are God's gifts to a needy world. We say a needy world—for the world, whatever else it may have, always needs great men. Such men are divine instruments, whether conscious or unconscious, and God's blessings are communicated through them to the mass of mankind. The best blessings of heaven reach us in this way, for all history shows that society is rarely improved, or civilization advanced, except through such an agency. Great men serve us intellectually, by giving us great thoughts, that stimulate our faculties and lead us forth into new realms of mind. They add new worlds to our world. By name we inherit the Universe, but great men give us practical possession of its magnitude and wonders. Newton has made the stars the servants of the navigator. Bacon has opened the mysteries of physical science to our use and admiration. Milton has enthroned the imagination amid the regions of infinite space, and associated all images of beauty, grandeur, sublimity, with the high themes of Christian faith.

Great men help us morally and socially. We think better and more lovingly of humanity because they have lived. Our ambition is excited to live noble lives, and our hearts throb with stronger pulses at the mention of their illustrious names. Principles are good, but men with principles in them are better. Such is our nature that we have deeper sympathies with men than with principles, and hence, God uses great men to implant great virtues within us. "Hero-worship" has been sinfully perverted. But there is a grand truth underlying its falseness. Men of sublime endowments mediate between us and otherwise unattainable good, so that the high and the glorious are brought within our reach. We prize them for the service; we honor them as our richest and truest benefactors. The measure of a great man's worth is the worth which he develops within us. If he is a mere spectacle, a grand show to our fancy, he is no benefaction to our hearts, nor will our being ever rise to sublimer heights because he has existed. But if we share his greatness, feeling his inspiring presence in our private moments, and grasping the lofty ideals revealed in his daily deeds, then, indeed, has he fulfilled the most honored mission that one human being can accomplish for another. Let us not forget, however, that true greatness not only comes from God, but is born of Him, and therefore like Him. Moral greatness is the sublimest attitude of the soul. Nor can it ever be the fruit of worldliness and self-seeking. Nor can it come from genius. It is the inspiration of God's Spirit, and wherever found, it bears His royal seal. All its acts, all its triumphs, return to Him and—thanks to the beautiful economy of life—as they return they bear us with them.

"HE GIVETH HIS BELOVED SLEEP."

All good gifts, as well as wise counsels, come from God. Sleep is one of his gracious gifts to a working and weary world! But no one gift of heaven has seemed to call forth fewer expressions of grateful acknowledgment; indeed, many seem to take shame to themselves that they indulge in such a weakness at all. It seems, by many, to be regarded as a waste of time; and we know not how many sage calculations we have read about the amount of time consumed, and, it is strongly intimated, thrown away and lost in sleep.

Why is this? Why not thank beneficent heaven for sleep as for other good things? Why be ashamed of one of the imperative necessities and grand comforts of our nature?

There are several causes of this error. In Scripture, sleep is sometimes figuratively employed to describe the sinful indifference of impenitent men.

Many have abused the luxury, and have slept, or rather lounged in bed, too long, and thus brought even good and natural sleep into an odious notoriety. From this has followed a reaction, and good, but sometimes mistaken men, have set to work to reform abuses in this direction, and in their overwrought zeal against an evil, have said hasty and hard things against an actual good. Like the old instance of disease attacking the man on one side, and the doctor on the other, and, between them, sadly damaging the man; so good and wholesome sleep has been served between enemies and ill-advised friends.

Among the Methodists, Wesley's sermon on "Redeeming the Time"—a good thing in its way, but misconstrued—has created a prejudice, and over-conscientiousness, in relation to sleep. Wesley, be it remembered, slept seven solid unbroken hours of good sleep every night for fifty years. We doubt whether there has been another such example of successful sleeping in modern times. Quite sure we are that no one within the circle of our acquaintance has achieved anything like so much. No revival or prayer-meeting kept Wesley out of his bed later than nine o'clock. No sick family required his watchful care. No claims of social life were allowed to interfere with his fixed habits. No Missionary meeting, or Conference Committee, kept him from the pillow a minute beyond the fixed unalterable hour.

Who among the Methodist preachers now can write that he has had seven hours' sleep each consecutive night for even twenty-five years? Not one, we imagine.

Happy were the Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who lived in those happy times before the invention of bells—fire-bells, milk-bells, market-bells, boat, and car-bells; and last, but not the least of evils, door-bells!

No cars left at two A. M. No special Church or Missionary meetings lasted until near the noon of night.

Ah! in that golden age of good sleeping, there was truth as well as poetry in those beautiful and oft-quoted lines:

"Balmy sleep—tired nature's sweet restorer."

No wonder those venerable men reached so ripe an age, and went down to their graves full of years and honors.

There were no nervous disorders then; indeed, it is questionable whether those happy men knew they had nerves at all.

Alas! those quiet times are gone—we never shall see their like again! The clangor of the bells, the roar of the wheels, the shrill scream of the raging whistles, has driven silence out of this feverish world; and short and broken is the sleep of mortals now.

People talk of the blessedness and recuperative power of mineral waters and tonic mountain, or ocean airs; and they may have something to do with the matter; but the fact is, it is because men lay aside the worry of life, and take time for sleep and repose, thus reinvigorating the exhausted energies of an over-taxed brain and body.

Dear reader; has Providence ordained you a condition propitious to good sleeping? Be thankful, and rejoice in these happy days ere they depart forever. Let no unmannerly croaker mar your joy. He has, alas, very far departed from the innocent and happy days of his childhood. He is not what he was, or he would not frown an unmannerly nod cold upon what was once one of the sweetest privileges of his childhood.

We say to you, if weary and worn, as the Master said: "sleep on and take your rest:" nature claims it as her due.

Having in my youth notions of severe piety, says a celebrated Persian writer, I used to rise in the night to watch, pray, and read the Koran. One night as I was engaged in these exercises, my father, a man of practical virtue, awoke while I was reading. "Behold," said I to him, "thy other children are lost in irreligious slumber, while I alone wake to praise God." "Son of my soul," he answered, "it is better to sleep than to wake to remark the faults of thy brethren."

STUDY OF THE ANCIENT LANGUAGES IN OUR COLLEGES.

The study of Latin and Greek has been of late often and severely attacked. The utilitarian tendency of our age has tried to deprive the classical studies of their time-honored place, and this tendency, constantly increasing, will probably not desist from shaking the Chair upon which this important branch of learning has been so prominently placed in our Colleges. Mathematics, natural sciences, and modern languages should—according to the opinion of the opponents of our present collegiate system—form the whole course of instruction in our Colleges. No more Latin and Greek.

But, by an impartial and careful examination, it will be found that these attacks, to a great extent, are unwarrantable, and that classical literature deserves, at least, to go side by side with the other branches above mentioned.

A good college education should aim to develope in our young men such powers of mind and such strength of character, as to enable them to gather the golden fruits of science with their own hands. The training in College should excite the students to noble mental labors, and furnish the foundation and necessary preparation which every one must have acquired and mastered before he can attain to high rank in any of the sciences.

This foundation, it is true, contains also much general learning, but all learning is dead without the gift of its proper application.

No science—none at least deserving that honorable name—can be properly mastered without the capacity of comprehending, thoroughly, ideal knowledge—of separating distinctly the ideas, of finding out the general by means of the particular, of understanding the causes, and of taking up and extending the thread, which our predecessors left us, by our own mental powers.

He only who has acquired this mental gift, can be called a thinker. Does not daily experience teach us, that a man of extensive learning may not be very useful in any place, while another of inferior knowledge, but of a thinking and penetrating mind, proves himself a blessing in his allotted station? Not he who has studied much is necessarily an expert man, but he who knows how to apply properly what he has learned. Without the latter capacity, knowledge is a fruitless possession; but with it, any deficiency in learning can be made up, and the boundary line between the necessary and important and fruitless on the other, can easily be drawn.

But how can this logical, practical, and penetrating mind, this preparatory training, indispensable for any person who desires to occupy a place in the republic of science, be acquired?

Mind reveals itself by language. Mental productions can be brought home to our understanding only by means of language; and if expressed in words suitable and correspondingly to their importance, the reader will they be appreciated.

There is a wonderful, mysterious connection between language and mind, as well as between body and soul; and there is, consequently, nothing that gives us such a clear insight into the nature and activities of the mind and, at the same time, exercises and regulates our mental powers so thoroughly, as the study of a language—not that of our vernacular, since we, in general, think and express ourselves correctly in it without analytical reflection—but of a foreign language, as we must, in order to acquire this mental result, trace it from its infancy to its gradual development and perfection.

Nations, moreover, deposit their richest and noblest treasures in their respective literatures. They are not the works of individuals, but contain the flowers of the civilizations of whole nations and long ages. All the sublime and grand ideas of a people, all its faith, love and hope, its whole spiritual life, is reflected in its literature.

But, it will be asked, why the ancient languages, especially the Latin?

It is true, the Latin language has for us no longer the importance it had a century ago; it is no longer the vehicle of communication between nations of various tongues, and no longer the language of science. The modern languages have been improved in beauty, refinement, and power, and are capable of expressing suitably any mental or spiritual thought or conception, and they do contain respective literatures fully equal to those of the ancient languages.

But the study of the latter has retained, and ought to retain its places in our Colleges, since it introduces the student into a literature that comprises all branches of learning which mankind had to create and master before they could attain to a superior education; and thus our young men acquire a knowledge of the foundations upon which our present civilization and advanced learning are built. Besides this, the ancient languages have received the finishing touches; their rules are settled and plain, but, nevertheless, not interfering with the free activity of the mind—an excellence of which the modern languages cannot so freely boast. And, lastly, the ancients have used in their writings a style and diction so suitable, and so corresponding to the ideas to be expressed—uniting power and dignity with suavity and grace, vivacity and flexibility with calmness and seriousness—that they will at all times be looked upon as standard forms.

He who is of the opinion that enough of material has been taken from the ancient and transferred into modern literature, so that the former may be acquired by translation, labors under an erroneous impression; since the spirit of any literature can be thoroughly understood only by means of the form, the original language, in which it has itself been revealed.

Persons not prepared to judge for themselves, should at least give weight to the opinions of such men as Daniel Webster, Rufus Choate, and others, who repeatedly acknowledged their indebtedness to classical learning. Even men distinguished in the so-called practical sciences, appreciate the great advantages, the wholesome training of mind, they have derived from the study of Latin and Greek.

By thorough instruction in the ancient languages—says a great philosopher—we arm ourselves against self-conceit and exaggerated self-importance, at the same time acquiring a habit of steady and deep investigation, which not even mathematics are fully able to impart.

A utilitarian age, which affects only such mental acquirements as can be exchanged directly for money, will always be marked by that shallowness and immoderate self-conceit, which are of course opposed to that thorough classical education, which humbles the mind, accustoms it to profound understanding, and inspires it with enthusiasm for everything true and beautiful. "Christian education," (these are the words of a great Protestant theologian) has no worse enemy than an absorbing tendency of the mind to the wants of worldly life, the utilitarianism which begins and ends with materialism.

BISHOP JANES AND JUDGE ROBERTS.

In this paper will be found the letter of Bishop Janes in relation to the dispersion of the Northern Methodist Conference in Texas, by the people of Bonham, Fannin county, and Judge Roberts' reply. Bishop Janes was President of the Conference, and Judge Roberts was Chairman and Spokesman of the Committee sent to order its discontinuance. They are the proper men to be heard, as the best representatives of the two parties. They are both intelligent and refined gentlemen, and both write well. We have thought it but fair that this matter, which has created so much attention, both North and South, should be thus fairly brought before the public. We trust the Christian Advocate and Journal will do likewise. We are willing that the public should decide. We hope the length of these letters will not prevent their perusal. They will be found of exceeding interest. They enter into the history of the country. That Judge Roberts gets the advantage of the Bishop in the discussion, we think none who read it will doubt. It had been much better for the Bishop had he remained silent. Those who encourage the mobbing, in fact, of Southerners traveling North with their servants, and the abduction of the latter, should be at least a little modest in charging simple defence of life and property with being mobocracy. The Revolution itself never had such a provocation as this movement in Texas.

OUR ACCOUNTS.

Brethren and friends, let us have them all settled. We shall continue to send them out, until the books are cleared of them. Will all our preachers and subscribers take interest enough in the welfare of their paper, to help us in this matter? We believe they will.

We are told that some of our accounts are incorrect. So they are, a very few of them, however, comparatively. It is not very often our fault, however; although sometimes it is. But if they are not settled, the same trouble will occur in the future; nay, it will get worse. Let us have an end of the matter, therefore, once for all.

When you receive your account, remit the amount immediately, or pay to the preacher. If it is incorrect, or you think so, keep your temper, and write us all about it—how much you have paid—when you paid—to whom you paid. You need not take the trouble to copy receipts. We have not a subscriber in the world whose word we would not take. Tell us the amount of the receipt, by whom given, and to what time it paid.

In the settlement of any disputed accounts, we shall always lean in favor of the subscriber instead of our own interest. We do not wish to obtain a cent wrongfully; settlement is what we wish. This is kind; be kind to us.

Many of our subscribers have received accounts, from whom we have not heard. Will they be kind enough to give this matter their attention?

Brethren, let us have these things all finished by the ensuing Conferences.

OUR PRESENT PAPER.

We think our readers will agree with us, that we have never issued a better paper than the present number, all things considered. Look it over—observe its arrangement—read its editorials, contributions, correspondence, selections and various news. Is it not valuable, interesting, tasteful, beautiful? Where will you find a paper of more handsome form and size, or more beautiful type, paper and press-work? Brother Preacher, is it not worthy of special efforts—speeches, at ordinary Church-service, at Camp and protracted meetings, in order to increase its circulation; especially when you consider the inspiring, sanctifying, refining culture of the intellect, the heart, the characters and the manners of the great body of the people, old and young, rich and poor, of which it is the instrument?

Conference is coming; we hope for a large increase in circulation. The Advocate was never so prosperous as now. And the evidences of its popularity, coming from all quarters, are numerous and flattering. The present number has on unusually large amount of reading. We had so much matter demanding insertion that we were compelled to use, in part of the paper, smaller type than usual, to get it in.

THE ENGLISH WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

This body assembled at Manchester on the last Wednesday in July, the various committees having been in session for about ten days previously. The vacancies in the "legal hundred" were filled, five by seniority, and two, Revds, Wm. M. Punshon and George Scott, by election. Dr. Hannah declined a nomination for the presidency on account of his failing health. His advanced years also induced him to decline re-election to the secretaryship, which he has so long filled. For the Presidency the Rev. Samuel Dousland Waddy received 311 votes out of 347 cast; and Rev. John Farrar 134 for secretary, and these elections were unanimously confirmed by the legal hundred.

In the "chapel committee" it was announced that nearly £300,000 of "chapel" debts have been liquidated, or placed in course of liquidation during the last five years. During the past year the Methodists of England have raised £143,000 for chapel and school purposes alone.

The Cincinnati Israelite, the organ of the Jewish people in the West and South, makes the following strange declaration: "As regards the Messiah, we in the United States are satisfied with the Messiahship of Washington, just as the prophet Isaiah was satisfied with the Messiahship of Cyrus.

LETTER FROM DOVER, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Dusseldorf Gallery—Execution of John Huss—Anatomical Museum—Doctor Durbin—Newport—Boston—Rufus Choate.

Mr. Editor.—After being so fortunate as to secure my trunk from the wreck of the "Huntsville," I secured a passage on the steamship "James Adger" for New York. We left on the afternoon of Saturday, July 30, and on Tuesday morning following, after a pleasant passage, arrived in the "Empire City." So many of the passengers were sick on the Sabbath that we did not have service. In New York I stayed at the "Metropolitan Hotel"—one of the most magnificent public houses upon the Continent. On Tuesday morning I visited the "Dusseldorf Gallery of paintings," and never spent more pleasant hours than those I experienced amid the productions of the great masters of European art. The town of Dusseldorf, the capital of the Duchy of Berg, in the Rhenish Province of Prussia—has long been noted for its school of art. It was from the artists who lived here, that we have this noble collection of paintings.

In this gallery we have the productions of Cornelius, (the founder of the "School,") Overbeck, Schadow, Hildebrant, Carl Clasen, Hasenclever, Anchonbach, Len, Solin, Koeler, Solin, Leutze, Lessing, etc. The whole collection of one hundred and eight paintings cost two hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

The largest and perhaps most celebrated painting is the "Martyrdom of John Huss," the "Arch Heretic of Bohemia." It is from the easel of Lessing. While looking upon this artistic representation of the sublime triumph of this noble hero of Christianity, one would almost be willing to die a martyr, if he could have so grand a posthumous picture to perpetuate a remembrance of the martyrdom. No Protestant can look upon it without hating Ludovic of Bavaria, (who was charged by the Emperor to superintend the execution of Huss,) and feeling a sense of bitter indignation, against that ecclesiastical despotism which is "drunk with the blood of the saints."

This painting is regarded as equal to the productions of Angelo and Titian. The next picture that attracted my attention particularly, was that of Hildebrant—subject: "Othello relating his adventures to Desdemona." It was executed for the King of Prussia, but never delivered owing to the unsettled condition of things at Berlin when it was finished. Contrary to the usual theatrical representations, the Moor is represented in the picture as a black negro—not a Barbary Moor. "The Madonnas," by Mullen, is a picture to be studied by the day. Mary is represented with the infant Jesus in her arms as being clothed with the sun—the moon under her feet—and a crown of twelve stars on her head. "Diana and her Nymphs surprised at their bath by Adeon," is a fine artistic reproduction of the familiar fable of ancient mythology. But, I cannot specify further.

The visitor to New York should never fail to spend at least a day in the Dusseldorf Gallery. It will make one better—enable one to understand what Zeuxis meant, when he said: "I paint for eternity;" and cannot fail to culture the æsthetic powers of the mind. I consider it the greatest object of interest in New York City. Next to it, perhaps—to the physiologist—is the Anatomical Museum, where every feature of physical development and phase of disease are represented? Those possessed of a fastidious modesty should pass it by.

I will not weary myself nor your readers by writing of those trite attractions—the parks, cemetery, Trinity church, etc.

I paid a visit to the Northern Methodist Publishing-house—but this, too, is common material for New York letter-writers to our Southern Advocates.

I called upon the Rev. John P. Durbin, D.D., at his house. He is an accomplished and liberal gentleman, besides being an elegant preacher and an indefatigable secretary. He is one of the conservative men of the Northern Church, but is near disparing of holding the General Conference to its former ecclesiastical anchorage. He is not, in any sense, a pro-slavery man; but thinks the abolition movement in the North a bad embodiment of fanaticism. If all the men of the North were like him, we should have no trouble upon the subject of slavery—the "vexed question" would be left to the vital forces of Christianity which would eventually certainly solve the problem of the right or wrong of this "peculiar institution."

From New York, I went by the Long-Island steamer to Newport, now in the height of its season. It is not the place for a Methodist preacher to enjoy himself; so I proceeded to Boston.

The pride of this city is Faneuil Hall—"The Cradle of Liberty;" the "Common," with its splendid old tree of revolutionary renown; the Bunker Hill monument; their splendid cemetery, etc. The city has recently mourned the loss of its most eminent man, Rufus Choate Esq. The law was his peculiar element; and, in his latter years, he eschewed political life altogether. He was trained in the school of Webster—hence, politically, he was a Whig. After the downfall of this political dynasty he became a National Democrat, but never expressed any sympathy with the Black-Republicans. He was a member of Dr. Nehemiah Adams' church, the most conservative clergyman in Boston. The Hon Caleb Cushing has accepted an invitation from the members of the Essex Bar, at an early day, to deliver a eulogy upon his character. The loss of Choate is national, and North and South may shed a tear of regret for the death of such a man.

From Boston, I came to Dover, New Hampshire, from which place I write this letter. From here I go to the White Mountains, Montreal and Niagara. You shall hear from me again. Farewell.

H. A. M. Henderson.

BISHOP PIERCE IN CALIFORNIA.

The Pacific Methodist says: If ever man needed to be temporarily endowed with ubiquity, our worthy Bishop does. Calls to visit every quarter of the State are multiplying upon him daily. Though both a good traveler and talker, it is impossible for him to accept all the invitations given. He will endeavor to distribute his time, however, to the best advantage, and hopes to visit all the districts. His ministrations will edify the people of God, and strengthen the cause of Christianity. In San Francisco his pulpit labors have made a profound and salutary impression. He has sown seed that will bring fruit.

On Sunday July 10, Bishop Pierce dedicated a new house of worship in Sacramento. Of this service the Methodist says: The building, though densely crowded, was too small for the accommodation of the large audience in attendance. The dedication sermon was rather a departure from the usual style of such discourses. The text was from 1 Cor. v. 19, 20. The preacher took possession of the audience in the name of the Lord. They were all created, blessed, blood-bought by God, and were therefore His, their bodies, their spirits, their affections, their wills, their worship, their service, their property, were all God's. The leading idea of the text was elaborated with great clearness and power, happily illustrated, and applied with practical pointedness somewhat remarkable for a dedication sermon. That large audience certainly heard the plain truth for once in their lives.

After the sermon, a collection was taken up for the purpose of extinguishing a debt remaining upon the building. About $1100 were raised—a handsome amount under the circumstances. There still remains a small indebtedness which, we trust, will soon be wiped off.

The new church is of brick, semi-gothic in its style of architecture, and is surmounted by a belfry, the pinnacle of which is adorned by the emblem of the coming brightness of the Gospel day. The interior is forty by seventy feet; height, about thirty feet from floor to ceiling. A gallery for the choir fronts the pulpit in the western end of the building. The walls are a simple, pure white—the most elegant and appropriate for a church. There are four beautiful gothic windows on each side. A handsome chandelier adorns the centre, and gas burners with globes are properly distributed throughout the building. A door to the left of the entrance opens into the pastor's study. The pulpit is tasteful and about high enough, and not too large. The building will comfortably accommodate about four hundred hearers—enough to meet the present wants of the congregation.

Bishop Pierce again preached to a crowded congregation on Sabbath evening. The new church looked finely by gas light. The sermon was excellent, some passages calling forth warm responses from a portion of the audience. There was considerable complaint of this discourse on one account—everybody said it was too short. Happy the preacher of whom no other complaint is made!

The recent transfers to California—Revs. D. W. Eppes and J. W. Simmons—are already initiated into the California itinerancy, the former in charge of the San Ramon Circuit, the latter as assistant preacher at San Jose and Santa Clara. We hope they are entering upon a long, happy, and successful service on this coast.

WHO WILL DO LIKEWISE.

A few days since, a brother gave me a hundred dollars to be invested in books, tracts, etc., and distributed where it was thought they would do the most good. This was a truly benevolent act, who will do likewise? There are tens of thousands in the bounds of our Conference perishing for lack of knowledge, in the midst of abounding plenty. Who will aid in their rescue? Come, friends of Christ; money invested in this way, will not eat your souls with canker. Hoard it up, and keep it for your own use, and you will wish by-and-by you had never been born, or, that you had been as poor as Lazarus. "The rich man died, and"—and you know the rest. Beware!

Canada Methodiste Paper.—The Canada Christian Advocate, since we have known it as an exchange—about six years—has changed editors three times. First, Rev. Gideon Shepherd, then Rev. George Abbs, and now, Rev. Samuel Morrison, recently elected. It is a good paper, the organ of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, and published at Hamilton.

The Christian Guardian, published at Toronto, is the organ of the Wesleyan Methodists, and is a large and able paper. They seem to be harmonious.

THE PUBLISHING HOUSE.

The Agent of the Publishing House, as I learn, will have to exhibit and report ready for the ensuing Conference. The showing in the way of assets will be about the same as that of the previous year; though a clear increase of upwards of $20,000 would appear, but for the adjustment of some of the former assets, in conformity with the action of the late General Conference, whereby a nominal depreciation had to be incurred. The report will show the business of the current year to be good, while the manufacturing department, working up to its highest speed, has been unable to meet the demands upon it. The demand is partly owing to the call for stocks by our Conference Depositories, just commenced business, with entire new outfits to supply as an outfit. Five Depositories have already commenced business, under seemingly favorable circumstances.

Many of the lovers of good Church Music may be pleased to learn that a new Hymn and Tune Book is to be issued soon containing all our Hymns, with notes, etc., all properly and conveniently arranged for congregational singing.—Christian Advocate.

A Venerable Bishop.—Some weeks ago the Nashville papers mentioned that the venerable and Rev. Joshua Soule, D.D., Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was very ill, and it was feared would not be able to resume the active duties of his office. We learn, however, that the Bishop has recovered his usual health, and is now on a visit to his relatives in Ohio. On Saturday, July 30th, he was at Lebanon, near Cincinnati, and preached a funeral sermon on the death of an old friend. The next day, Sunday, the 31st, he again preached his sermon occupying one hour and twenty minutes. His subject was the Prodigal Son. Some of his allusions to his ministerial life, the deaths of his former colleagues, Winans, McKendree, George, and others, were very touching. "Fifty years ago," said the Bishop, "on the 5th of January last, I left my father's home to begin the work of a Methodist traveling preacher, and this day, July 31st, I close the 78th year of my life." He spoke with his usual distinctness and compass of voice sufficient to make himself heard by a large congregation.

Bishop Capers not a Pastor.—Bishop Andrew writes a sketch of Bishop Capers in the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, for July. It is brief but interesting. This passage reveals one of the defects of Dr. Capers as a preacher: "As a pastor, Dr. Capers was not altogether a model. He did not visit his people as generally or as regularly as was desirable. In a good many other Methodist preachers, he traveled large circuits at his commencement as an itinerant, when he had not much time for visiting. He thus contracted a habit of neglecting pastoral visitation, which he never overcame. This his best friends deeply regretted, as it was no doubt a considerable deduction from the success of his ministry. It is due to his memory, however, to say on this subject, that the sick and poor were not neglected in his pastoral visits. He never passed by the houses of the poor and widowed and afflicted of his flock. These he was apt to find out in their troubles, and was to them an angel of mercy."

Short Articles.—Dr. Stevens of the Christian Advocate and Journal, says: "One remark more. Correspondents make a great mistake in writing long articles. A communication which is a fourth of a column long is read by most readers, unless its subject is manifestly repulsive; over half a column long is usually read by half our readers; a column long by a third of them; a two column article by not one-tenth; a three or four column one by nobody whatever, except the wearied editor and his proof-reader, and the few who may have a personal or very special concern in the article. After nearly twenty years editorial life, this is our best estimate of the probabilities of being read in newspapers. A word to the wise, etc."

Methodist College in Kentucky.—It is stated that Rev. Mr. Welburn, the Agent of the Methodist College, located at Millersburg, has succeeded in raising twenty-one thousand dollars in Bourbon county towards the erection of the College edifice, which is to be completed and ready for occupation on the fifth of September, and thirty thousand dollars towards its endowment. They had ten thousand dollars to begin with.

After the Time.—Some of the communications on the inside, especially from our "Home-work," have been on hand some time, on account of our absence, and otherwise. We are striving to overtake our contributions and correspondence, and to do our whole duty to our brethren. Send us all revivalistic diligence, and all items of every kind relating to the entire progress of the Church. Such intelligence is refreshing, and will do good. Do not write such things on the same paper containing business matter—let it be entirely seperate—so that it may go immediately into the hands of the printer. If the paper has business matter on it, it goes into the hands of the clerk, and may never reach the printer.

Mrs. Jane T. H. Cross, wife of Rev. Dr. Joseph Cross, passed through this city last week, on her way to join her husband in Texas. Our readers may soon expect to see the columns of the New Orleans Christian Advocate illumined by some rays of her mental and spiritual sunshine. She will correspond for us regularly. Texas—which means paradisiacally beautiful—will have its eastern gate unlocked by the touch of the charming pen which has transferred Italia's beauteous scenes to the horizon of the Western World.

Auburn Female College, Auburn, Alabama, Rev. E. D. Pitts President, is reported as highly prosperous, though we have received no report from it. On Monday, after preaching at La Grange, we were engaged to deliver an address at the Auburn commencement; but the cars passing La Grange at day-break, and worn out with the labors of the day previous, we missed the train by a few minutes, after running for half a mile. We regretted it, but could not help it. We desired very much indeed to visit our old friends at Auburn.

A Good Investment—It is Safe.—Mr. Scott, a member of the Wesleyan Church, was near his end; he performed the last act of his life in signing a check for £50, for the Zealand mission, and then uttered these remarkable words: "These for the work of God in Zealand; I send my last check to heaven for acceptance; and the inhabitants will see that the writer (his hand trembled) will soon be there himself."—Dr. Clark's Life.

Ah how many who are spending so much here, will regret when they get to eternity, that they did not send more of their money forward to meet them in that world!

Dr. Clark's Essay on Tobacco.—"When my pamphlet got to this place, (Congleton) it was read by several. Mr. and Mrs. Shadford, who had used this pernicious weed for forty years, gave it up at a stroke. The rest of the society followed their example. They then began to mourn and pray for forgiveness. God poured out his Spirit upon them, and such a revival has taken place as has seldom been heard of.

"Mr. Reed, who is assistant, and Mr. Shadford, both declared in Conference to-day, that the whole of the revival was under God's owing to the pamblet."—Dr. Clark's Life, p 100.

Hon. David Clopton.—Since the election is over, all political preferences aside, we rejoice to know that Alabama will have in Mr. Clopton one of the purest and most noble-minded representatives in Congress ever sent from any State. He is a graduate of Randolph-Macon College, a lawyer of immense popularity, and a class-leader and Sunday School Superintendent of the Methodist Church

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

AUGUST 24, 1859.

NORTH-WESTERN SEMINARY AT CHICAGO.—A correspondent of the Presbyterian says that the Seminary has been granted the use of the first-class dwelling-house, with forty furnished rooms—lecture, lodging, parlors, and cooking—all furnished "without cost." This provides accommodations for the Faculty till suitable permanent buildings can be erected. He states that they are anticipating the acceptance of all the professors elect.

The salaries of the professors elect have been fixed at $3,000 per annum, Dr. Rice refusing to receive any compensation for his services for the present.

A beautiful spot of ground, containing between five and six acres, has been offered, and will in all probability be accepted, as the site of the Seminary buildings, though, as yet, the location has not been agreed upon. The land is estimated to be worth $40,000.

CERTIFICATE.—We have received through Dr. Sehon a copy of the new certificate of the Juvenile Missionary Society, got out at the Publishing House. It is an elegant thing, and will be greatly prized by the members of the Sunday School Missionary Society. They can be had on application to the Book Agent, at ten cents a copy.

MEMPHIS CONFERENCE INSTITUTE is the name of the institution at Jackson, Tennessee. Rev. A. W. Jones, President. Board pre-paid, is only $50—and the same for tuition per session. If not pre-paid, $60 in both cases. The institution is highly spoken of as a female school.

BEAD-VILLA SEMINARY, near Baton Rouge, is under the care of Mrs. Mary W. Read, who is well known as one of the most experienced and reliable female instructors and governors in the South-west. The institution is quite prosperous.

MADISON COLLEGE, Sharon, Miss., the catalogue of which is out on our table, is under the Presidency of the Rev. T. C. Benise, D. D., assisted by a full and competent faculty. Not personally aware of its condition, we hear a good report of it.

PRESIDENT GARU, of the Sharon Female College, called on us a few days since. His advertisement is on third page, fifth column. We are glad to learn from him that this old and deserving institution is prosperous.

MONTPELIER (Ga.) Farm School is advertised in fourth column, third page. We made the acquaintance of Mr. Martin, Presbyterian Minister, at La Grange, Ga., recently, and heard him highly spoken of as a teacher by those competent to judge.

COLUMBUS FEMALE INSTITUTE.—We have received the catalogue of this Institution. Its advertisement is on third page, fifth column. Rev. B. F. Larroben President. The Institute is flourishingly prosperous. It is located at Columbus Mississippi.

MACON FEMALE COLLEGE, near Memphis, Tenn., has an advertisement in this paper, third page, sixth column. President Tarry is well and favorably known throughout this country as a reliable and experienced Instructor.

THE BANNER OF PEACE, Cumberland Presbyterian, Nashville, Tenn., is strongly in favor of establishing a Publishing House for that Church.

J. HUTCHINSON, Esq., Livingston, Sumtet county, Ala., has his law-card in this paper, third page, fourth column, to which we call attention, recommending him to the charge of all who may need the services of an attorney.

Bishop Baker, of the Northern Methodist Church, as we learn from the California Christian Advocate, arrived in California on the 28th of July.

A LADY OF EXPERIENCE, a fine pianist, desires a situation as music teacher. See her notice on third page, fourth column.

WICHITA HERALD.—We have received a number of this new paper, published at Camden, Ark., and exchanges with us.

THE BONHAM WEEKLY EEA, published at Bonham, Fannin County, Texas, has reached us. It is an interesting paper.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Location—Grand Mountain Scenery—Water-Falls.

Gadsden District.—REV. E. HEARN writes: "Having closed my third round on my District, I write you as to the condition of the work. I think we are gradually advancing; not adding very remarkable any way. Some slight revivals. We are looking for better times at our camp meetings, commencing 1st September.

"My District lies in a very mountainous country, where we have many curiosities to close countryman. We have a considerable number of beautiful water-falls on the Lookout mountain, on Little river, Black and Yallow creeks. The one on Black creek is near the south end of the mountain, in the neighborhood of Gadsdon. Black creek is about thirty or forty yards wide, running for many miles on top of the mountain, with a rock for its bottom, with a moderate current, when all at once it falls clear one hundred and one feet into a deep basin. Just where the fall is the rock forms a curve, in the shape of a horse shoe. The widest part, say 300 feet, while at the points it is, say 200 feet. The bluffs on either side are more than 100 feet high. Under the sheet of water, and on one side, there is room to shelter, I suppose, 1000 persons under the over-hanging rocks. It is said there are springs of delightful water and other waters there. Arrangements are being made to entertain visitors who may wish to spend their time on the mountain.

"The upper falls on Little river, is quite a rugged, romantic place. The river, above the falls, is solid rock bottom; the bed is, say fifty or sixty yards wide—the banks rough craggy rocks. The water makes a tumble of, say thirty feet; then runs on pretty swift for some fifty yards and makes a clear fall of, I suppose, 100 feet, into a basin of great depth. The bluff on one side of the basin is not less than 200 feet high—a plumb smooth wall, while on the other side it is nearly as high, but it consists of benches or crags, forming a beautiful point—the bluff is, say 400 feet high, and from that point down for, say 100 yards or more, the bluff must be from 300 to 500 feet high. Some eighty or 100 feet from the top there is a bench running along the side some three or four feet wide, on which persons can walk—the bluff above, nearly 100 feet high, and below some 400 feet. In the wall there are some three or four rock houses or rooms, some fifty or sixty feet in circumference, with large rock pillars to hold them up. From this point, say 150 yards, the river is, say 150 yards apart. There are two rock walls, of ancient date, running from bluff to bluff—one of them nearly straight, measuring 160 yards—the other forming a curve, measuring 200 yards, being near each other at both ends, but in the middle forty yards apart. These walls are avidently the work of men's hands, but by whom, no one knows. There are large trees on the wall and in the trenches. The Charokee Indians have no knowledge by whom it was done. It must have been a fortification.

Praise to whom praise is due"—Parsonage for the first time—A Good Predecessor—The Good Sisters.

Macon Circuit.—REV. W. C. HEARN writes: "In the Advocate of January 26th, I was reading an article under the heading "How the new preacher was received," and was greatly surprised to find in that communication some extracts from a private letter written by myself to a brother in the ministry, touching our reception on our new appointment. I am not offended because of its publication, for I desired every body to know the facts—but, as a part has been told, let us have the whole story—know who the kind people are, and who the highly favored preacher is, so that we may rejoice understandingly, and give the praise to whom it is due.

"The Macon Circuit parsonage is located in the village of Shorterville, on the M. and G. R. R., 205 miles from Mobile. If the building materials had been in the hands of a more experienced architect a more imposing and convenient house could have been built, and by a preacher of extremely delicate taste, objections might be brought—but, sir, to tell you the truth, to a preacher and family who have "boarded around," "no place within the bounds of the Circuit, at which board could be had," to bring in one end of a rented house, with another family in the other, and the like for four years, and in a parsonage for the first time, it is comfortable, very comfortable, elegant; and they are prepared to appreciate, properly, all its conveniences. By the way, my good brother, (P. C. W.) who took the liberty to publish my letter, has never enjoyed a circuit with the above mentioned luxuries; "hoarding around," etc. But we had better be quiet on that subject, or we may hear from Tennessee again on" Cane."

"To the subject again. While these large-hearted people were willing and desirous to make the parsonage complete and foot the bills of expense, it was necessary for some one to take the business in hand, and we are largely indebted to my predecessor (Rev. K. H.) for his untiring efforts to complete and furnish the same.

"Let his example be imitated by every preacher who may occupy a parsonage, in leaving the whole in order, with "grass mown," turnips pinsted," etc., etc. You know, Mr. Editor, that it is impossible for a moving family to leave a house in order, but the good sisters here, God bless them, anticipated that difficulty, and although the old occupant left but ten hours before the arrival of the new, they were on hand with "duster and broom," to make ready for our reception.

"The items given in the naration of that reception, and the kindnesses shown (and still they come) may seem small in the eyes of some, yet they added greatly to our comfort and increased our gratitude.

"And, my brother, when we assembled to offer our evening sacrifice, at the new home-altar, before our God, those kind people were remembered there, and God's choicest blessings were invoked for them.

"Now, I verily believe God will bless those who care for his servants, for it is written, "He that receiveth you, receiveth me," and in fulfilment of this scripture, God will dwell with us, and we shall be refreshed from His presence, and see His pleasure prosper in our midst."

State of Religion—Glennville Female College—Union Female College—Glennville High School—German and French Music.

Eufaula District.—REV. J. W. LANEY writes: "The spiritual condition of the District is good—considerable interest in some places—many seeking salvation. The preachers are doing their duty. Much is doing for the Sabbath schools. The preachers feel quite an interest in this part of their duty. Our Missions are doing well. The missionaries are full of faith, expecting great success. The number converted in this District, this year, is not ascertained; at Eufaula some twenty. There are thousands of souls ready to hear the word preached all over the land, and the word will not return void. We have some fine schools in this part of the State. A female school at Glennville, under the presidency of Rev. Mr. Douglas, a fine Instructor. No parent need hesitate to send a daughter to the Glennville Female College.

"The Union Female College (Eufaula) commencement exercises have closed; the young ladies acquitted themselves nobly. The president, Rev. Mr. M'Intosh, feels much for the destiny of those under his charge. He labors that the young ladies may not only have literary, but also moral and religious training. The wife of the president has no equal as a manager and instructress. Many a young lady will go out from the Union Female College and bless her.

"The Glennville High School commencement exercises have just closed. This school is a Conference school, but the preachers heretofore have done but little for it, but it is worthy. Rev. Mr. Wright, the president, is worthy and well qualified to be at the head of such an institution. It is a male school; the boys are well trained and taught, and parents who wish a good school for their sons, preparatory to college, can find no better. I think we shall feel and do what we ought to do for this school, if it remains in connection with the Alabama Conference.

"There is one great objection to the music taught in all our female colleges; it is so full of French and German. If a man at a concert sits still till it is all over, he is well nigh exhausted in trying to gather out of their scientific blows and thumps on poor instruments some little melody—some "concord of sweet sounds." To be perfectly French and German in this particular, I cannot and will not; and to be scientifically killed by performances without music, I cannot stand. I have concluded not to attend any more concerts. It is said that I have no taste or ear for music. My daughter will never receive music lessons from imported infidel teachers."

Ash Creek Colored Mission.—REV. P. R. MCCRARY writes: "At the last Conference I was appointed to form this, a new Mission. I began early, and now have seven interesting appointments served once a month, about 150 children regularly catechised, and about 1000 blacks attend preaching on the Mission. This is entirely a new field. I came to the work without a single appointment. The Mission is in favor with blacks and whites. The owners are highly gratified at the rapid progress which the catechumens make. I think if a prudent young man could be appointed in connection with the present missionary another year that the Mission could be extended so as to afford employment for two preachers. About fifty have joined the Church."

Uchee Mission.—THE MISSIONARY writes: "I now send you the report for Uchee Mission for the past two quarters. This work was discontinued two years ago. Owing to family afflictions, I could not organize till late in January. Since then we have been doing the best we could. There are eight appointments to the blacks, and two to the whites. The work is prospering. The patrons are deeply interested. The names of Brothers Lowther, Hurt and Banks will be held in blessed remembrance for their zeal in this cause. The sisters are not inactive. On many of the plantations they have formed classes among their blacks, and spend their Sabbath afternoons in teaching them the catechism. Both white and black are growing more and more interested in the work."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Great Revivals—Methodism on new Ground—A negro 104 years old Converted."

Westville Circuit.—REV. B. B. WHITTINGTON writes: "With gratitude we record the wonderful outpouring of the Divine Spirit, and addition of many precious souls to the fold of Christ, in this section of the great vineyard.

"On the fifth Sabbath, and Saturday before, in July, we held a meeting on Silver Creek—a new place, where many grown up men and women had never heard a Methodist preacher preach, until within a few months past, when we broke the monotony of the scene, by proclaiming a free salvation to all who will accept it upon gospel terms. It had been predicted that the Methodists would fall of success at that place, but the few friends of the enterprize erected a rude stand and arranged seats in the grove—God's ancient temple. The weather was fine and the congregation large; many being attracted by the novelty of the occasion. The word preached was effectual, in so much that ten souls were added to the Lord, and many others seriously impressed; so that, we have now a nucleus there. We are persuaded many will gather around it. Many express themselves as glad of a change, and some, like the noble Bereans, are searching the Scriptures, to see if the doctrines preached are true. It was a good meeting in its immediate results, and, in prospective, if we are not greatly mistaken, still better—it is the leaven, that with proper care, will leaven the whole lump. Rev. J. W. Williams, a local preacher of the circuit, was with us, and labored effectively.

"On Friday the 5th inst., we commenced a meeting at Mount Zion, in Covington county, and continued it ten days. It was a time never to be forgotten. The congregation was the largest ever assembled in this section of the county. But there was not the least indecorum. All were attentive and serious. The Church was wonderfully revived, and fifty-three new recruits—forty-five whites, and eighteen colored, were added to the number of the faithful. Of the whites, several are heads of families, and men of position and influence. Some are matrons, but a majority of them are "young men and maidens," of the first families in the land—youths of intelligence and refinement, of whom the Church may expect much, and through whose instrumentality, God shall, doubtless, receive a large revenue of praise. Of the colored portion of the increase, one is a free man, aged one hundred and four years, and never before a member of any Church.

"Such are some of the abiding fruits of the meeting—the trophies of the cross of Christ; but who shall describe the height scenes of glory displayed from day to day, as the "ransomed of the Lord returned to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads?" Language fails, but in view of the Divine presence, overshadowing the awe-stricken multitude, and inspiring the faithful with songs of holy triumph, our full soul exclaims: "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." Amen, even so. Lord Jesus, dwell with thy Church, "save thy people and bless thine inheritance."

"We were aided in the meeting two days, by the Rev. H. F. Johnson, of Monticallo, who preached in demonstration of the Spirit and with power. The Rev. W. Williams, Baptist minister, preached one sermon; Rev. J. W. Williams, mentioned above, though quite feeble, and sometimes almost ready to faint, stood shoulder to shoulder with us throughout the contest, and saw victory perch upon Israel's banner. "True yoke fellow," may the Lord reward him a hundred fold in this life, and in the life to come, place upon his head the promised crown.

"The circuit is in a good condition, and we are confidently expecting a general revival."

Attala Circuit.—REV. L. ENGANBACK writes: "We have held several protracted meetings recently, at each of which, souls were converted, backsliders reclaimed, and the Church much revived. A Salem we closed a five days' meeting, July 20th—three conversions and two accessions.

"An incident. A gentleman got converted on Monday. His wife was absent a day's ride—he left early next morning for her, and got back the next night. The meeting was closed. His wife had become greatly concerned for her soul's salvation, and such was her distress of mind that he took her next day to see a local preacher some five miles off. While at his house the good Lord powerfully convirted her soul. She clapped her hands and for hours praised God.

"At North Union we closed a five days meeting, August three—three conversions—three accessions and a number of reclamations. It was a good and profitable meeting.

"At Smyrna we closed a nine days' meeting August 14. Truly was had a time of refreshing. At one time we had every sinner in the house but two at the altar—and every Church member was happy—parents and children, husbands and wives were at the altar rejoicing together—conversions shown—accessions 14. Thanks to Bros. Shrack, Raney, Muff, Cox and Sweat, for their ministerial assistance."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

North Rapidan Circuit.—REV. R. T. PARISH writes: "I send you the following as the fruits of our third Quarterly meeting held at Oak Grove on sixth and seventh of August, which resulted in the conversion of seventeen souls and nineteen accessions to the Church. God was among us in great power; and many were enabled to rejoice in His love, the membership were greatly revived. The meeting closed with many penitents at the altar. May God pour his blessings upon them and save them all. Rev. J. A. Fly, was at his post on Saturday and preached with his usual freedom. Rev. R. F. Alexander, Agent for Pierce and Paine College, fell in at the proper time, and contributed greatly to the success of the meeting."

Opelousas.—REV. H. F. WHITE writes: "Our third Quarterly meeting, twenty-third and twenty-fourth July, at Plaquemine Brulee. The word was attended with power, and the result was a glorious revival. Several conversions, thirteen whites and nine colored accessions. Rev. A. R. Fly, was with us to edification. The Rev. R. F. Alexander was with us, preached successfully, and was successful in obtaining the handsome subscription of six or seven hundred dollars for Pierce and Paine College. Up to this time, we have received into connection, sixty-two whites and fifty-four colored—on probation, twenty-five whites and forty-five colored. O! Lord, carry on the good work!"

Nachitoches Circuit.—REV. O. P. WESTMORELAND writes: "I am gratified that the Nachitoches Circuit is improving. Congregations are increasing, the Church is being revived, backsliddon members reclaimed, and sinners are being converted. We closed a two days' meeting, at which seventeen joined the Church on probation; and seven former brethren returned. Brother C. C. Preston preached for us. Our meeting closed on Sunday night; not until both exercises and Sunday school had been organized. The people here are kind and affectionate."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

LOCAL.

YELLOW FEVER has not, as yet, made its appearance. The "heated term" passed, blessed with almost daily showers, and intimations of the cooling autumn beginning to be felt, it is confidently believed that we shall not be visited by the yellow scourge this season. The weather is delightful. As a consequence, we already observe signs of an early opening of the business season. With the immense grain crop already harvested, and the large cotton crop in prospect, together with the health of the city, the opening season is looked to as probably the most prosperous, in a commercial sense, ever witnessed in this city.

THE Charmer came into our port this morning with one thousand and twenty-five bales of new cotton.

The receipts of new cotton up to Saturday last were 1240, against 780 bales to same date last year. Last year's was the largest crop ever raised, and the present promises greatly to exceed it. He must be a daring man who will wager against four millions of bales—say two millions for this port. Just think of it—one hundred millions of dollars of our single product.

The largest product of new cotton that has reached our wharf, is the growth of our own State—the parish of Tensas being the banner cotton parish.—Delta.

Complication of Italian Affairs—The Pope Refuses the Presidency—50,000 French Troops Remain in Italy—The United States and Germany—Seven Perugians Sentenced to Death—

LIVERPOOL, August 6.—A dispatch from Paris announces that the representative of Sardinia has arrived at Zurich.

The Lombardy official journal says that French diplomatic agents had received instructions favorable to the wishes of the Italian people.

Disturbances have occurred at Cremona, but they were not of a political character.

A dispatch from Turin says that the Dictator of Modena has announced that he shall resolutely defend the National independence against the rule of Austrian Archduke.

The Paris Siecle expresses its opposition to the Pope's assuming the Presidency of the Italian Confederacy.

The Pope, in reply to a communication from the Emperor Napoleon, says he will not accept the Presidency of the Italian Confederation until he ascertains whether such acceptance will pacify Italy and promote the interests of the Catholic Church.

Cardinal Antonelli has proposed a new scheme for an Italian Confederation, the object being to control and crush out all revolutionary movements.

The Pope has condemned to death seven of the leaders of the outbreak at Perugia, for their participation in the affair, but the persons condemned have made their escape from prison.

A temporary occupation of Italy by 50,000 French troops is reported to have been determined upon, the troops to be stationed at various points throughout the Peninsula.

Austria, it is said, intends to maintain a respectable army in the Venetian Kingdom.

The United States Government has sent instructions to its Ministers in Germany, to demand of all the German Governments the release of all German naturalized citizens from military and other services which have been claimed by them.

Surplus of War Loan.

The French navy is being reduced to a peace footing.

The unexpended balance of the 500,000,000 loan voted by the Legislative Assembly, to defray the expenses of the war, amounts to 150,000,000 francs. This sum is to be devoted to internal improvement.

Affairs in Italy.

It is reported that an attempt has been made to assassinate Garibaldi.

It is said that the French Government is intriguing for the restoration of the Grand Dukes of Tuscany and Modena.

The Government of Naples has issued a decree admitting breadstuffs free of duty.

A deputation of distinguished citizens of the Venetian Kingdom had arrived at Turin, with an address to the Emperor Napoleon, which they presented to the French Embassador at Turin, to be forwarded to Paris.

This address contains a formal protest of the provinces of Venetia against any direct or indirect domination of Austria in that portion of Italy.

It is supposed that Garibaldi would take command of the Tuscan army.

Resignation of Baron de Bach.

Advices from Italy announced that Baron de Bach, the most influential minister of the Austrian Cabinet, has tendered his resignation to the Emperor. His Majesty, however, has refused to accept it.

The reason assigned to Baron de Bach for taking this step, is said to be his opposition to the reform measures proposed by the Emperor.

A serious ministerial crisis is believed to be impending, owing to the conflicting opinions of the Austrian Cabinet upon this subject.

The Vienna Gazette publishes an imperial ordinance, revoking the commercial restrictions imposed on account of the war.

The exportation of horses and mules is, however, still prohibited.

The Brussels paper, Le Nord, denies the report that has been extensively circulated, that King Victor Emmanuel had a secret interview with the Emperor Francis Joseph, at Villa Franca.

Completion of the Great Eastern—Reception of Peace Embassadors—Red Republican Manifesto—Napoleon's Movements—British Parliament—Russian Prince in England—Mexican Affairs in England—The Elections in Italy—Expected Rupture between Austria and Prussia—Cotton from Africa.

The Great Eastern steamship was completed on the 8th and the event was celebrated by a grand banquet on board. A large number of distinguished guests were present on the occasion, which passed off in the happiest manner. The ship was nearly ready for sea and was expected to sail in a few days. Her destination is Portland.

The members of the Zurich Peace Conference were everywhere received with the highest honor and distinction, both in Switzerland and on the journey thither. Their arrival at Zurich created much excitement among the people. The official authorities, also, with the burgomaster and commissioner of the Federal Government at their head, gave them a warm and brilliant reception. There seemed no distinction of person or Government. Whether French, Austrian or Sardinian, all were welcomed in the same hearty manner. A grand public dinner was to be given the embassadors by the city authorities on the 11th. As to the proceedings of the Comgarence itself, now in session four days when the Hungarian left, nothing had transpired.

Mazzini, the chief of the Red Republicans, had issued a manifesto, which had created considerable excitement in London, and is published by a large number of the Journals of that city. The article is headed "European Coup d'Etat," and reviews at length the late events in Italy. The writer is very severe on the Emperor Napoleon, and the article has created considerable excitement in political circles.

The Emperor Napoleon had left Paris for the Camp of Chalons for a grand cavalry review. He would return to Paris as soon as the maneuvers were over, to direct the preparations for the celebration of the Fete Napoleon on the 15th. The triumphal entrance of the army of Italy would take place on the 14th.

The proceedings in Parliament, since the departure of the Asia, have been principally confined to the discussion of the Italian question. And on this question the debates had assumed a much milder tone. The provisions of the bill organizing a strong military "reserve" force, and presented by the Ministry, had been published, and the whole subject had led to exciting debates in the Commons.

During the debates in Parliament upon the Italian imbroglio, the ministers stated that the Government had no intention of taking part in the settlement of the details of peace upon the basis concluded between the two Emperors at Villafranca.

It was urged that England should play her traditional part in the settlement of great questions of European policy.

The Grand Duke Constantine, Admiral of the Russian Navy, had arrived at Spithead in his new and splendid ship, General Admiral. The Grand Duke would remain but a short time in England. He would pay a brief visit to Queen Victoria at Osborne House, and then return direct to Russia. The sailing qualities of the General Admiral are very highly praised, and she was generally the object of admiration.

The London Times publishes the provisions of the reported treaty, said to have been made by Mr. McLane, between the Juarez Mexican Government and the United States, and accompanies it with extended comments. The Times thinks the alleged treaty might prove beneficial to Mexico, the United States and the world at large, but it fears the interests of the foreign, especially the British bondholders in Mexico would be prejudiced thereby.

The elections for members of the National Assembly in Tuscany had been held. The election resulted in the choice of members entertaining moderately liberal views, but most firmly opposed to the restoration of the old dynasty.

Advices from Berlin state that the relations between Austria and Prussia were beginning to assume an alarming character, and that the ill-feeling existing between the two Governments had become so great that a regular rupture was anticipated. The threatening attitude of the two Courts was considered as dangerous to the smaller States of Germany; and some of the petty Governments, it is reported, were already looking to France for protection.

Advices from Africa report that a considerable quantity of Cotton had been raised in the eastern districts of the African Gold coast and that probably most of it would soon be shipped to England.

From China.

The Overland Friend of China, in an article referring to the great rebellion in China, remarks that there was no very clear evidence that it would succeed, or no great certainty that the government would be able to subdue it. A letter from one of the provinces in partial possession of the rebels, states that they were publishing the Bible, or certain parts of it, demolishing idols or certain Buddhistic images, opening schools, etc. It is said, however, that the insurgents have imbibed gross errors, and that the Bible printed by them is the version of Gutzlaff, in whole or in part, in which his phraseology and that of others are blended perplexingly.

Affairs in Mexico.

The steamship Habana, Capt. McDonnell, left Minatitlan on the 17th inst., and brings advices from Caliuren to the 5th. She also brings later and very important news from the Isthmus of Tehuantepec and other parts of Mexico. Her purser furnishes the following report:

RONCKAY OF THE MAILS.—The California mails and passengers arrived at Ventosa by the steamer Gregon on the evening of the 14th inst. The mails and passengers immediately started overland for Suchil, and when within six miles of the town of Tehuantepec they were attacked by a band of Patricias, and the mails were cut open and robbed of everything of value. The passengers and mail party were also robbed of everything valuable and then allowed to proceed. No cause is assigned for the commission of these outrages, except the desire for plunder.

The Habana brings the remnant of the mails and seven passengers from Minatitlan.

The latest advices from Vera Cruz (no date given) state that President Juarez has issued a decree making marriages, births, deaths and adoptions, matters of civil record.

General Miramon had dissolved his cabinet, and his government is represented to be in a state of great disorganization.

General Marqueza had revolted against Miramon, but he was besieged in Guadalajara by the liberal forces.

The Archbishop of Mexico has excommunicated the whole Liberal party.

General Wall has been defeated at a town in Tamaulipas, losing all his artillery and many men.

General Degollado has assumed the chief command of the Liberal army, and promises to conquer the capitol by the first of October.

Llobos started an expedition against Oaxaca, but broke down before he had made much progress.

The state of Zacatecas is infuriated against the Church party on account of the ultra sentiment proclaimed by the Jesuits.

Degollado demands three millions of dollars and forty thousand troops to enable him successfully to carry on the campaign against the Central Government of Miramon.

President Juarez's decree confiscating the Church property is in course of execution.

The bonds of the matured debt of Mexico have risen ten per cent in value.

DOMESTIC.

Extensive Fraud on the Government.

WASHINGTON, August 20.—Major Edmond French Pay-Clerk of the Bureau of Construction, to the Treasury Department, has been arrested for extensive forgeries of certificates, etc., on the Department.

A Treaty with the Juarez Government.

WASHINGTON, August 21.—Information has just transpired in this city which leaves little if any doubt that Mr. McLane, our Minister to Mexico, has concluded a treaty with the Constitutional Government of Mexico, and that it will be forwarded to Washington early in September.

The treaty has reference mainly to the right of transit over Mexican territory and certain privileges in regard to exemption from custom-house duties, for which our Government will grant.

COMMERCIAL.

MONDAY EVENING, August 22, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on the 20th instant: The past week has been a period of very little animation in our market generally, as there are few buyers in attendance and but very limited stocks of our leading staple to operate upon. The new crop of Cotton is arriving as yet but in limited quantities, and it will be some weeks yet before much activity can prevail, though thus far it has met with ready sale.

Advices from Liverpool to the 6th inst. report the week's sales at 40,000 bales, and the stock at 657,000 bales, of which 590,000 were American. The sales closed at previous figures. Manchester advices were favorable.

COTTON.—We have no material change to notice in the cotton market since our report of Saturday last. As we then stated, the great bulk of the old crop remaining consists of low-running, mixed and dusty lists, which are unsaleable, while there is a demand for low middling, middling and strict middling, but these descriptions are rarely to be met with, and in limited parcels commanding full prices. The week's sales sum up barley 5,600 bales; received since 1st September, (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,664,056, being against 1,506,000, bales to same date last year. The total exports of the week amount to 11,151 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 19th inst., 22,635 bales. The week's receipts embrace 1172 bales new crop; 900 bales new crop have been sold at an extreme range of 11¼ to 13¼c.; the prevailing rates being 12 to 12¼c. for middling to good middling.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	6¾@ 7¾	Good Middling	12¾@12¾
Ordinary	8¾@ 9¾	Middling Fair	12¾@—
Good Ordinary	10 @10¾	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@11	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11¾@11¾	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 700 hhds. We quote for Inferior and Refining 4 to 5; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 7 to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified — to —; Refined — to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of the week are about 500 bbls. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 33 to 35; Prime to Choice and Reboiled 37 to 38 in hbls., City-refinery reboiled 38 to 40 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs—factory, — to —; planters 3¾ to 4¾; Leaf—Inferior to common 5 to 5¾; fair 0 to 0¾; fine 7¼ to 8¼; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9¾ and 10 cents per pound. The sales reached barely 300 hhds.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 9500 bbls. The market continues its heavy and inactive appearance. We quote a range, from $4 00 to $4 25 for ordinary to superfine, $4 50 to $4 75 for good superfine, $5 25 to $5 75 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 00 to $7 00 and $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands. The new flour is of very superior quality.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week amount to about 10,000 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 80 to 90c. for ordinary yellow mixed and yellow, 90c. to $1 00 for good yellow mixed and white mixed, and $1 00 to $1 10 for ordinary to good and prime white. Oats sell at 44 to 52c. for ordinary to prime St. Louis, and 45 to 52½ cents per bushel for Northern. Bran is quoted at $1 00 to $1 20 per 100 lbs. Wheat, we quote 95c. to 97½c. per bushel for ordinary red to good red.

PORK.—The demand this week has been of a very limited character. We quote Mess at $14 25 to $14 50 per barrel—dealers realize $15 25 to $15 75.

BACON.—Shoulders 7¾ to 8; Ribbed Sides 9¾ to 10; Clear Sides 11¾ to 11¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 13½ cents per pound. Purchases have mostly been made from second hands.

COFFEE.—We quote ordinary at 10¾, low fair 10¾, fair to good fair 10¾ to 11¼, and prime 11¾ to 11¾ cents per pound. Stock, 20,000 bags against 18,300 at same period last season.

MARRIAGES.

"It is not good for man to be alone."

THE "ARTISAN."—OUR READERS WILL be gratified to learn that this very excellent journal of American and English Patents, Science, Art, Discovery, Invention, etc. etc. published by the American Patent Company, at Cincinnati, Ohio, is now the cheapest scientific and mechanical paper in the world. The Company having an immense capital of $100,000, have recently resolved to place the terms of the ARTISAN so low that everybody can subscribe for it. We advise all our readers to send for a specimen copy, and determine for themselves, whether it is not well worth $1 50 for fifty two papers. It is fully up with the times in illustrations, scientific and mechanical information. The Company is a regularly incorporated Institution, and comprises in its Directory some of the leading men of Cincinnati. It is largely engaged in selling as well as soliciting Patents. GREENSBORO HIGH SCHOOL.—REV. J. W. N. MEARS, A.M. M.D.

The exercises of the third session of this school will commence on the first day of September next.

The session comprises nine months—including the usual holidays—and is divided into three terms of three months each.

French will be taught for a small extra fee.

The Principal will take a very few boys under his immediate supervision in rooms adjoining his own. The amusement and labors of such boys out of school will be under the direction of the Principal.

Those parents who have sons to board out, will, it is thought, at once recognize the advantage of such an arrangement.

The play-grounds are ample and pleasant, and the house commodious and furnished most neatly and comfortably.

Young men can prepare to enter the Junior class in any of our Colleges.

Miss E. D. Mears takes a limited number of young ladies on whose education she bestows particular care. All the branches essential to a polished education are taught.

The attention of parents is especially invited to this Department.

COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, BATON ROUGE.

The Exercises of this Institution will be resumed on the 12th of its toher next.

The Principal intends to spare neither labor nor expense to make the school in its Educational Facilities and its moral influences, equal to the very best Schools in the country.

As the number of pupils is limited, it is desirable that applications be made as early as possible.

Parents are earnestly advised of the importance of having their children at School as promptly as possible. The loss of a few days at the beginning, often proves a serious disadvantage to the pupils, and greatly increases the labor of the teachers for the whole session.

For information and Circulars, apply to Rev. J. B. WALKER, New Orleans; Rev. C. G. TOTMAN, Monroe; T. P. CLINTON, Esq., St Joseph; Rev. A. A. IVY, Alexandria; Rev. R. B. SCRATT, Mansfield; or to FELICIANA FEMALE INSTITUTE, JACKSON, Louisiana.

The next Session of this Institution will begin on the First Monday in next October.

Its design is to furnish facilities for a thorough Education, both useful and ornamental.

Extensive grounds and houses have been added to the premises, and nothing will be spared to make the Institution a safe, pleasant and profitable resort for pupils. TERMS, moderate.

The Bishop who had stood ...up to this thing, in seeming embarrassment, remarked when I ...had closed, "As you treat me courteously, sir, I desire to treat you the same way! but I have not even the pleasure of knowing your name." These are his very words, for I noted them particularly at the time, and made a memorandum of them as soon as I left the house. I gave my name. He then observed, in substance, that he was taken by surprise, that he had no suspicion that the Conference would not be well received, that four years ago (I think) a similar Conference had been held on the same spot, and that no objection had ever been heard of to its session, that he had no authority to answer our demand, and was going on with further objections, when, perceiving that we were about to get into something like a discussion, I interrupted him, and said—that we understood his position; more had already been said than we intended, and that we could hold no longer parley, but would expect their answer at the stated period. I was in the act of going when the Bishop again addressed me, and asked if he would be "permitted" to go on with the service of the hour. I replied that we came not for the purpose of interrupting them at worship, and that they were at liberty, as far as we were concerned, to consume the two hours as they pleased, in worship, or in deliberation, and left the room.

Having now gone through the interview, and for the truth of what I have said, I appeal to every gentleman present, let us resume the consideration of the extraordinary narrative published by the Bishop. As the outset he signalizes the "occurrence" as "violative of the Constitution of the United States," and the reason given is that that instrument ordains that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States," forgetting, or ignoring another cardinal principle that these same "privileges and immunities" are to be enjoyed, so that in the use of them, the "privileges and immunities" of others shall not be trespassed upon. Sic utere tuo ut alienum non leadas, [so use your own as not to injure others,] is a maxim old as the common law. Any man has the "privilege" of building an edifice, and, if he sees fit, he may set it on fire and consume it, but if, by firing his house, he also recklessly fires mine, he is guilty of a crime, and the law will punish him. "The sacred rights of speech and conscience," it would seem, too, have been violated. How? Because a man may worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, are there to be no limits to this inalienable right? May he erect his altar in my own house, and preach rebellion to the members of my own family, and the poor "privilege" of telling him he must not do the like again be denied to me? Am I to stand by and see one bent on enjoying his Constitutional "privilege" of carrying fire in his hand, carelessly or intentionally waving a hand-torch about my grain stacks and barn filled with combustible materials? Or shall another sturdy freeman, because he has the "privilege" of digging a hole and placing a keg of powder therein, insist that there is no limitation as to place, that he may put it under my house, and still I have no right to cry out? Or bring the matter home—May any one, because his Constitutional "privileges and immunities" are equal to those enjoyed by any one else, lawfully claim the right to come to my door, harangue my servants upon their inalienable rights—endanger not only my property, but my life, and the lives of my wife, children and neighbors, and the privilege of resisting him be denied to me? Why, this would be monstrous; and yet the Bishop's understanding of his "privileges and immunities" would result in just such license. Let his Church free itself from its abolition fanaticism. Let it confine the duties of its ministry to teaching the word of God, and leave the politics of the country to the State, and they would be welcomed among us. But, alas, there seems little hope of this. When one of their leading Bishops can see no difference between the preaching of a Minister of the Southern Church in the free States, against whom no charges have ever been made, and the preaching and "teaching" of the Northern Ministry among a slave population at the South doctrines that may lead to such fearful consequences—where he is so innocently "thankful that the Southern Ministers" have never been "mobbed" in such cases, and "prays they may never be," covertly hinting that they might as well be;—I say, while such things are, we can hope for no ray of reason on this subject from the Northern Church.

A peculiar feature of the Bishop's letter in this connection is his studied effort to evade either a denial or admission of the grossness of the charge against his branch of the Church i. e.: that it is emphatically an abolition organization, systematically pushing its propagandists through the rear of Missouri and Arkansas into Northern Texas. The charge was plainly made at the meeting on Saturday, and the Bishop duly apprised of it by the Committee. He does not admit it, neither does he deny it, but flies off on trivial issues as to "surprise," "shortness of time," etc., anything for evasion. This is more than an admission: but is only one conclusive fact in a chain of evidence already sufficiently perfect.

A few words on another point; The Bishop throughout calls the Committee a "mob." Aside from its strict primary meaning, a "rude, disorderly, tumultuous and promiscuous multitude," the word mob, in its American sense, has a meaning implying violence of some kind. Now I ask, even by the Bishop's own showing, if his choice of the word, to express the character of the Committee, does not savor a very little of the "irritation" and "excitement," which he seems to think I manifested on the occasion of presenting the resolutions. He says—they marched with considerable regularity, in platoons from three to five deep, thinks most of them were armed, during prayer they gathered around the Church, while singing the second hymn, as many as could crowded into the Church. At the close of the singing commenced giving out his text, when he was interrupted by the "spokesman" by "do I address the Bishop," which he must have heard as he quotes the words. Nothing daunted, by this armed "mob," he braves them to their teeth—" made no reply but continued giving out his text." A second inquiry to the same effect, to which he answered in the affirmative, when the "spokesman" said, "I have an unpleasant duty to perform and presume it will be equally unpleasant to you," and then went on to read the resolutions, and demand a reply, etc. Now there is no mention of noise, of disturbance, of insult to any one, or of any kind of violence. The Committee—I beg pardon, the "mob," were in the house but a few minutes. No one uttered a word except the spokesman, (and the Bishop gives the version of his remarks tolerably accurately, but leaving out a few little matters.) They retired as they came in and the Bishop proceeds with his sermon as if nothing had happened! Now, does it look like truth to say that the Conference had been assailed by a mob under the circumstances? If our object was violence, what hindered us? If we had intended to disperse the Conference then and there who prevented us? If we had intended even to disturb them, why did we not do it? The conclusion that none of these things were intended is inevitable, unless it be thought that the Bishop with his five members of the Conference cowed or overawed us, and that we slunk like whipped children, to hide ourselves from so august a presence. I said the Bishop's own showing did not describe any of the features or characteristics of a mob, and I think I have here demonstrated it.

But now view the whole transaction in its true light. It is understood that a dogma, dangerous to our peace and even our lives, is openly proclaimed in our streets, the people hurry together to their temple of justice, to confer and counsel; they investigate; they find the rumor true; they also learn that its promulgator is a preacher of a certain denomination, then sitting in high Conference at their very doors, that this denunciation throughout its length and breadth, have been for years promulgating this same dogma, the "extirpation" of slavery—the resolutions of some twenty odd Conferences having been read to the meeting to that effect; that the business of the Conference then in session was to stake out the territory hereabouts, to be occupied by those who were to teach what the Church professed; why, the wonder is that they did not rise en masse, fly to arms, and cast the incendiaries from their midst, as no better than thieves or robbers!

But self respect dictated a different course. They had met to consult of their safety. They had detected the evil and pointed it out. They determined to "eradicate" it, but not now, with violence. They will lay the whole matter before the offending party, and demand a redress of their grievances, and appoint a committee for this purpose of imposing numbers, and of the best men in the county who chanced to be present. No mob yet, is there? Well, this committee repairs to the place of meeting on the next day [it being understood that it is the last day of Conference] in perfect order and decorum. They resolve to wait until the morning service is over, and only depart from that resolution for the reason above given. They walk quietly into the Church; the last hymn is about sung; no interruption of the hymn, three or four verses of which are sung, while the "mob" respectfully awaits the conclusion. During this time, the Bishop politely hands a chair to the "spokesman," and at the conclusion, so little is he disturbed up to this time, that he gives out his text. No mob yet, is there? The "spokesman" now interrupts the Bishop and introduces the object of the committee. The Bishop listens to the conclusion, when he says, "as you have treated me courteously, sir, I desire to treat you in the same way." What! a mob treat the object of its hatred with courtesy? Shade of Poole forbid! When the interview was concluded, the Bishop asked if he understood us to forbid the further continuance of the morning service, when he was told we left it entirely with them, whereupon he preached his sermon. Within the limited time, two members of the Conference informed us that they had conducted to "suspend their ministerial functions, until the meeting of the Quarterly Conference." Not a "categorical" answer, at last, the Bishop chuckles out, but which he says "was satisfactory, and that they dispersed." Strangely enough seeming to imply a censure that we did not stick to the letter and have our "categorical" answer. Well, now, here is the end of it all, and I, for one, am willing that any one who will take the trouble to read both sides shall say whether we were a mob, or a people met together in a primary assembly to consider of our grievances, and to demand redress.

But it seems that this answer, which was not "categorical," was only a ruse, after all. It was made on Sunday, and received by the committee in good faith; yet, what do we see? The Bishop, in his letter, says that the Conference met on Monday morning, entered upon the discharge of "ministerial functions," "finished up business," made "appointments," duly "set down for the Texas District," and each man belonging to the Conference received his appointment without flinching." What kind of faith is this? Have our Northern brethren meddled so freely with isms, have they so rigidly prescribed sumptuary laws, and so blasphemously incorporated all manner of social and political theories into the Gospel platform, as to claim a papal right to absolve from premises,—to keep no faith with heretics? To ordinary perception it is but an infamous deception.

The Bishop affects to beat a loss for the "motive" of this "extraordinary procedure." He says "much ado le made" [at the meeting of the people] "about an alleged remark of a local preacher not a member of the Conference, a citizen of the county—but if the remark was made at all, I think it must have been after the meeting was called and arranged, and therefore could not possibly have been the reason of calling it." (The italics are mine.) It grieves me to copy this paragraph. It grieves me to see a Christian gentleman so recklessly publishing his 'thinks' upon a point, upon which the whole matter hangs—to wit: The 'motive' for the extraordinary procedure," and at the same time, and as part of the same communication, publishing a clear reputation. I ask every one who reads this to lay down the paper, just here, and read every speech delivered of the first meeting [which he will find in Bishop James letter, taken from the Bonham paper] then let him read the preamble and the 2d resolution, and say, whether or not he believes Bishop James when he says he 'thinks' the offensive language alluded to and which was the sole cause of the meeting, was uttered after the meeting was called." I know, from sure and certain information, that the Bishop was informed of the truth of the whole matter on Saturday evening, the very day of the meeting.

But he had to ignore the true cause of the outbreak, to pave the way for what amounts to a little more than an insinuation—viz: That the Methodist Episcopal Church South is alone chargeable with the movement. If I really believed that this was the Bishop's opinion, I might take some trouble to convince him of his error. The accidental circumstance, that two or three members of the Committee were of that Church would no more prove it a Methodist Church movement, than the presence of Baptists and Presbyterians would prove it a Baptist or Presbyterian movement; for there were fully as many members of the two latter Churches, as of the committee. It was the movement of no Church—of no party—but the unpremeditated uprising of the people for the protection of their property, their firesides and their homes.

The Rev. gentleman having worked his way through this sad affair, takes an airing, and parades his stilted piety before us, in a manner to make us ashamed of ourselves—he blesses and curses not—returns good for evil, etc; all of which seems to me out of place, and in bad taste; but de gustibus non—etc.

One word and I have done. I have written this for the cause of truth. I cannot expect it to be circulated at the North. The Church organs have not the fairness to publish it; but I wish our own citizens to know what we did and why we did it. Personally I have no object in the controversy—the Bishop misrepresented me when he said my manner of address was "excited" and "vehement;" the language "inflamatory," my tone "irritated," etc. He probably thought so; but those who know me better, or were in a better condition to judge, would pronounce far otherwise. Nor does he seem ever once to have thought of the meaning of the first words I uttered—"I have a disagreeable, a painful task to perform." What else, but the deep sympathy I could not help feeling for a gray headed old man, placed in a most embarrassing situation, could have caused me to utter these words? But higher duty urged me, and I discharged it. But this is all personal to me, and let it pass. I regret that I have been so lengthy. In less space I could not have made any suitable reply.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

WILLIAM A. FERRELL, a native North Carolina, was born August 29, 1805, and died, on a visit at Bladon Springs, Ala., April 30, 1859. When young, he settled in Mobile, and rose from the position of clerk, to the head and management of a commission house, which he carried on for many years. He married Miss Wynne, of Green county, Alabama, and removed to said county about 1842, and engaged in planting, until his death. His wife died leaving him three children. He was married the second time to Mrs. S. M. Chambers, of Marengo Co., Alabama, who survives him. He was an honored and bright mason, and for many years was Grand Lecturer of the State, and by his uprightness and sterling integrity of character, secured many fast friends. Brother Ferrell was a zealous and faithful member of the M. E. Church, South, for about seventeen years. He rendered the Church much valuable service, as Class Leador, Circuit, and District Steward, and at the time of his death, was a Conference Steward of the Alabama Conference. In short, he was a man of fine social feelings and hebits. As a master, he was beloved to a remarkable degree. As father, friend and husband, he filled the christian standard. His praise was on many tongues. His example an honor to the Church. What wonder, that such a man should "die the death of the righteous. He bore his protracted sufferings with firmness, and frequently told his wife that he was ready to depart and be with Christ.

ANN EDWARDS was born in North Carolina, September 15th, 1774. She professed religion in her 15th year, and soon after joined the M. E. Church, of which she continued an exemplary member during her stey on earth. Many years since she emigrated to Alabama, Cherokee county, where she continued a shining light until the 24th of July, 1859. On the Sabbath before her death, there being a protracted meeting near, she said, "go to the Church and tell the brethren and sisters I shall meet them no more on earth, but I want to meet them all in heaven. Tell the sinners I shall soon cease to pray for them, but I want them to meet me in heaven." She continued to suffer patiently one week longer and then went home to rest. Sister Edwards lived near seventy-eight years in the M E C. without a complaint against her. On Monday the 25th of July, the writer preached her funeral to a large company of relatives and friends. Her aged companion, near 85 years old sitting by her coffin. May God strengthen him to meet her in a better land.

MARY MARION BURNETT, died June 11, 1859, aged about six years. Her mind was too strong for her body. Her frame appeared as fragile and gossamer-like as the butterfly, and as beautiful. She looked like an angel escaped from heaven, enveloped in an almost aerial body. She said, again, and again, "My Lord and my God, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." So resigned was she, that her Ma said to her, "Mary I believe you want to die." "No," she replied, "I do not want to die, but if I do die, Jesus will be kind to me." She often sang "There is a happy land," and improved her last hours by exhorting her friends to love the Saviour—and praying for her parents. She was reared in the cradle of the Church, loved her Sunday-school, and there learned what she observed to her mother, that "heaven was the best Sunday-school."

A good angel kissed it up to Heaven. Oh! it did look so innocent and happy when it was laid in the grave.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a corative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate to the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstruation, Cholorts or Green Sickness. Try it. You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 15, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure well confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUMNER—A girl of 15 or 16 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no Panacea, nor Nostrum, but Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well gotten up by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us.

J. R HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in saying that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as you there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold.

Very respectfully yours, O. E. STEVENS.

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from J. W. Vesey, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE, Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request, in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectully, J. W. VESEY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ABERDEEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VESEY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a sovereign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save to quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, in my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered, but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, varying in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VASSER.

H. T. HELMBOLD.—Dear Sir: I have been troubled with an affliction of the Bladder and Kidneys for over twenty years. I have tried Physicians in vain, and at last concluded to give your Genuine Preparation a trial, as I had heard it highly spoken of. It afforded me immediate relief. I have used three bottles, and I have obtained more relief from its effects and feel much better than I have for twenty years previous. I have the greatest faith in its virtues and curative powers, and shall do all in my power to make it known to the afflicted. Hoping this may prove advantageous to you in assisting you to introduce the medicine, I am truly yours, M. MCCORMICK.

The Goddess Hygeia

When Hygeia lent medicinal aid to man,
And taught him all his evils how to scan,
Not to a favored few she showed the way
To stanch the wound and all its pain allay—
Not to the few who now claim physic theirs,
And think but what they give legitimate wares,
Nu! to all human kind command she gave,
"Employ your skill, and your sick brother save."
So went he forth the Magic Salve to find—
The Magic Salve that now heals all mankind.
Nor Wound nor Bruise, nor Cut, can long remain,
Nor Scar its rude appearance long retain.
Use it—you'll find we are not trash's detractor,
For you'll be healed by

The Roads—The Wilds—The Company, the Stage, and its Economy—Mode of Travel—Ramon the Cook—The Meal in the Wilderness—The Night-Ride and the Bivouac—Mountains never lost Sight of—Mountain George—Beautiful, Grand and Impressive Scenery—San Pedro.

On reaching Fort Clarke we had to make our final arrangements for the long, lonely travel before us. At this point we bid farewell to the settlements. For 500 miles there is not a human habitation except at the military posts, and these are from 75 to 125 miles apart.

Before we start, I may say that nothing surprised me more on the route than did the well-defined, beaten highway, where I had expected a dim, dubious trail, passable by wheels, chiefly on account of its simple, natural adaptation. We not only have a road well-located but worn smooth and, seemingly, as much used as though it led to a commercial city, close at hand. The explanation is found in the fact of the trade from New Mexico, Chihuahua and Sonora, to San Antonio; the passage of Government trains between the forts, and the heavy emigration along the Southern route to California. Every day the stage-traveler meets or passes some one or more of these trains, consisting of waggons and carts and herds of cattle or horses, teamsters and out-riders, men on foot, women and children—always a company large enough to constitute a sort of itinerant society, and strong enough to fight a respectable battle if the Indians should be troublesome.

In the solitary wilds it is quite a relief to see a human being—one of your own race—and to feel that, far as you are from home, you are not quite out of the world. Sometimes, I confess, I felt like a fragment of creation, broken off at both ends—all the associations of the past dissolved—afloat and lost, wandering, adrift—an unknown sky above me—earth, desolate and bereaved around me, all silence and solitude—an orphan look about everything, as though God had smitten and cursed, and human life had all perished or fled the land. One of these moving caravans—the sound of the human voice—the evidence that there was some hospitable point ahead, which we met with now and then, revived memory, restored hope, and made us feel that we might once more mingle with our kind. But, I forget my story.

When we were ready for a start, we found our company consisted of three ladies and fourteen men. This latter number includes passengers, driver, cook and guard; we had two stages, one drawn by five, and the other by four mules. Each stage had a driver and a conductor as he is called; there were two out-riders to the train, and a man, dubbed captain, who orders every movement. Myself, wife, daughter, and the three preachers, occupied one stage, with our luggage, luside mostly, and yet enough behind to balance the stage. On the front seat set the driver, guard and conductor, each well-armed, with a six-shooter, and one or two of Sharp's rifles behind the cushion.

The stage is not the old-fashioned coach of the East but a kind of wagon, with an oblong body set on leather braces, having three seats, into which nine persons might crowd, but four or even six might find room enough. As we were but six in number, and one very small one, we had margin for change of position. The boot of the other stage was our store-room, containing cooking utensils and provisions. The Captain gave the word of command, and away we went.

The general plan on this line is to drive the same team the whole day, and to secure speed while in motion and yet save the mules from exhaustion, this arrangement is adopted. We travel two hours, making from seven to ten miles an hour, then stop—strip the mules, bubble them, let them graze an hour or more—hitch up again, travel two hours more, stop again, and so on till nine or ten at night, then camp till morning.

Start very early, travel two hours; while stopping to rest and refresh the mules we cook breakfast and eat it. Late in the afternoon we stop and cook another meal, this is dinner and supper compounded. With this explanation we proceed.

We left Fort Clarke after dinner on 22d May; about sunset we halted on the bank of a beautiful little stream, and prepared to sup. I must describe this operation once for all.

Our cook was a Mexican named Ramon, a bright good-humored cheerful fellow—but certainly never educated for his profession. True, our larder did not tax his skill by the variety of its supplies, but his performance with the coffee-pot and frying-pan would have satisfied any one, even less observant than myself, that a more complex operation would have nonplussed him altogether.

On stopping, all the employees of the stage-line spread themselves in quest of fuel. A few dry sticks were soon gathered—the fire kindled, the kettle put on, and water heated; an old bag is brought from its resting-place in the stage hoot, its open mouth laid upon the ground, the other end is seized and suddenly lifted, and out come tin-cups and plates, iron-spoons, knives and forks, helter-skelter; another bag rolls slowly out, containing the bread; presently another cloth is unrolled, and a piece of beef appears. Now a box is brought forth; the lid is raised, and we behold coffee, tea, sugar, salt, pepper and pickles—a goodly supply. The coffee-pot is now in demand—Ramon finds it soon, and you recognize it immediately as a "venerable institution," a Western pioneer, battered by hard service—besmeared with the smoke of long martyrdom, to say nothing of the dust of long travel, but still stout and ready for use. The ground coffee is put in, water poured on, and all well shaken—the coals are ready and the pot boils. By this time the frying-pan is hot, the lard melted, the meat sliced, and soon our senses are regaled by the hissing urn and the simmering flesh—the sound is pleasing as the smell is savory. China as well as Java eater for the feast, and the cup which cheers but not inebriates" will soon be ready also. The table-cloth of many colors, all inclined to dark—as innocent of water as the loom that made it—is spread upon the ground. Plates, tin-cups, knives and forks are arranged in order, and Ramon announces: "Supper ready, gentlemen." All hands gather about the cloth"—oblivions of dirt, careless of dainties—and the necessaries of life disappear very rapidly. The fragments are left for the prairie wolf and the birds of the air; the cloth is shaken, and on its dingy surface a few more spots appear, of the same sort however, only a little more lively from being fresh; the unwashed instruments are boxed and bagged, and we are ready to travel.

By the time the mules were harnessed and hitched night was upon us. Prudence made it necessary to travel twenty miles further for a safe encampment.

Where we supped and for miles, there was a thicket of low bushes, fine for a Camanche ambush, and we preferred to rest where our "watch" could see for miles around him. This precaution is universal with all the drivers on this route.

When all were seated, we whirled away too fast for danger from any savage on foot, or, indeed, from any but a numerous band. About half-past ten we passed a camp of traders, and soon drew up on the same plateau and prepared for rest. The stage we occupied was soon converted into a bed-chamber for Mrs. P. and Ann. By a judicious arrangement of trunks and cushions a bed was made—the curtains were buttoned down—the wife and child laid down; I wrapped my traveling blanket around me, bound in one corner and slept soundly. The gentlemen all spread their cloaks, shawls and blankets on the ground, aye, even the dirty road—for fear of "the snakes in the grass"—and, as they reported in the morning, rested well.

Very early we were up and off again. The whole country is poor and rocky—a bed of gravel—treeless, and with but scanty herbage of any kind. Vastness is the only attractive feature; except that the mountains—some near by, others distant, dim and blue—are to be seen all around.

Indeed, I may as well remark at once, that I have been surprised and disappointed the whole way. Perhaps I was shamefully ignorant of geography, or careless in my reading. I have only to say, that it is a good while since I was at school: and, in my early days, this region was set down as "an unexplored wilderness." Those who have passed through it have either written of their adventures or been silent. The route is always spoken of as a journey over the plains: accordingly, I expected to see a level country, vast prairies—unrelieved, except by an occasional stream—but, it is a world of mountains. From Austin, Texas, to San Francisco, California, you never lose sight of mountains; they rise up before you, surround you—rise up on the right hand, on the left hand—you are on them, below them, among them, at every step. Yet, except when compelled to ascend or cross one of the huge ridges that unite the chains, the road is level or of such easy grade up or down, as rarely to interfere with the speed of travel. In fact, it is marvelous how such a highway was ever found, amid difficulties, obstructions that would seem insurmountable. Of course it is zigzag, tortuous,—enough, indeed, to well-nigh double the distance. But I must not anticipate too much.

After a run of two or three hours over a delightful road we found ourselves suddenly descending a canon in the mountains of the San Pedro or Devil's River. This is a very narrow gorge, and doubles some very sharp points—the high walls, almost perpendicular, loom up on either side and throw down a deep dark shadow, and, as you go down, down—the air gets damper and cooler, and you begin to think of tunnels and vaults and subterranean dungeons, and presently the roar of water breaks upon the ear, and then, suddenly, right at your feet, there rolls one of the brightest streams of pure rushing water, pouring over the ledges of its rocky bed, as if dancing in gladness to the sound of its own music.

At the point of crossing, the river is wide—the bottom a solid limestone rock—the banks fringed with green; the mountains, of fantastic shape, some looking like huge tumuli—the graves of the sons of Anak; others like temples in ruin; others, like the columnar memorials of past history; and, here and there a vast pile of boulders and fragmentary rocks—victims of some old earthquake—footprints of a geological upheaval (post Adamite, I trow); here too are glens and gorges, cloud-capped towers, and bumble nooks; caves of darkness and vistas of beauty; the lonely river, with its flashing water, leaping and laughing as a child in its frolic; and, as it sweeps along to the base of some bony rock, high and high, pausing into a stillness—arrested, dumb, like the same child in the presence of wisdom and years. The scene is lovely, grand, enchanting. The impression is sublime, thrilling, religious. You feel like praising the God who made it. I felt, if I had such a retreat for daily private prayer I would be a better man. It humbles, exalts, awes, subdues, exhilerates. The vision is worth far more than all the toil and money it would cost to reach it—even though you came from Aroostook or the Capes of Florida. The Spanish fathers called the river San Pedro, (St. Peter) after the Apostle. Fit name for the hills and rocks, and the waters preach adoration of God. What a barbarism!—almost profanity to call it Devil's River! Alas, we Americans are a practical, not an aesthetic people. D. F. PEARCE.

LETTER FROM MINNESOTA.

St. Paul, Minnesota, Aug. 15, 1859.

Mr. Editor.—I wrote you last from the mountains of South Carolina. Since then, I have been almost constantly on the wing. I am now in the great North-west—so many, from all parts of the South, are traveling in this country now—a description of it would interest but few.

St Paul is destined to be a great city, and Minnesota, the land of lakes and rivers, will be soon a great and populous State. Ten years ago, this was all a wild wilderness. The roving Decotahs, Chippewas and Sioux, were the only human inhabitants; now, splendid cities rise above the ruined huts and wigwams. Here are—Winona, Hastings, St. Paul, St. Anthony, and Minneapolis—all fine and growing cities. The three last, almost within a stone's throw of each other. We see here and there a delapidated "tent" in, and around which, a few Indians gather—the men to smoke and drink "fire-water," and the women to work beaded slippers, purses, and other fancy articles.

To-day, at the Fuller-house, a fine-looking Chippewa was seated near me at the dinner-table; her dress was completely Americanized, but in all things else, she seemed a child of the forest still. I have a fine photograph of the Chief of the Chippewas, "Hole-in-the-Day," which I intend to present you with, when we three meet again. I have also a photograph of the "Fawn," the "Sioux Beauty," dressed in the style of a city belle.

The soil of Minnesota is, for the most part, the most fertile prairie—unlike Illinois, it has plenty of timber—the open prairies being small, and thickly surrounded with heavy forests. St. Paul, the capital, has 15,000 inhabitants—the first house was erected ten years ago, it is built on the eastern bank of the Mississippi—perhaps it would be right to say the northern bank, for here the course of the river is nearly East and West.

The number of Churches speaks well for the morals of the place. There are four Methodist Churches here—two English, one German, and two regular Episcopal. In the Park street M. E. Church, they have a conservative membership, their pastor last year, was a slaveholder.

I met to-day two much-loved Methodist ladies from Mississippi. Many who read the Advocate will remember Sister Claland, the consistent, faithful-working Christian; and "Lizzie" Cluland, with her sunny face and beaming smile, the same earnest, zealous Christian now as when we knew her, a heppy shouting girl, around the altar in the old Church at Brandon. Her name is changed, and she has grown older since then; but there is the same old smile, and her voice is still musical as when in other years we heard her sing

"Oh happy day, that fixed my choice
On thee, my Saviour and my God."

It is pleasant to meet them in this far-off land, and pleasant to know, though their feet have wandered many weary miles away from scenes dear to them from sweet associations of other years, they have not wandered from "the good and the right way."

I am stopping only long enough by the way, to see all that is novel. I have but two or three days for St. Paul, and then move on to St. Anthony's Falls, Fort Snelling, the Falls of Minnehaha, and to the Northern Lakes.

One thing let me say for this "free" country. In my travels all through Illinois, through part of Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota, I have heard scarcely a single oath uttered. I have seen not one single drunken man. Men drink and swear in this country, no doubt, but I am convinced that there is much less of it than with us in the South.

Except on the steamboats and railroads, I have seen but few negroes in this "free" country—these, when questioned, all say they were born either in New York City or Philadelphia.

There is no place like home. "I would not give my own, my native land," for all the broad acres of these boundless prairies, for their oceans of golden grain, their great cities, and their "free" institutions. Give me the South, with its hospitable homes, open hands, and generous hearts, forever. H. T. LEWIS.

GENERAL CONFERENCE:

The Ratio of Delegation ought to be changed—from Quadrennial to Biennial Meetings.

Mr. Editor: I believe that all the connectional Churches of this country have General Assemblies, Conventions, or Conferences, which meet annually, biennially, or quadrennially. These Assemblies, Conventions and Conferences, are composed of members elected by the proper or constituted ecclesiastical bodies of the several Churches interested or to be represented, sending one for so many ministers and elders, ministers and churches, or ministers of a certain class only.

In looking over these Churches, I have seen that the Methodist Episcopal Church, North, has less representation, per membership and ministry; than any other Church—only one for every twenty-one traveling preachers in full connection; and the Methodist Church, South, one for every fourteen traveling preachers in full connection, up to last General Conference; since then, one for every seventeen. And there were those in the last General Conference who wished the representation to be only one for every twenty-one!

In the Methodist Church, South, according to the last Minutes, there are 691,609 members, and 2408 traveling preachers receiving appointments, and 163 superannuates, making 2571, and 4984 local preachers. Total preachers, 7555; total preachers and members, 699,164. The editor gives a note, in which he shows that full returns have not been made from certain portions of the Church, and that the grand total might be set down safely at 700,000! But we will take the figures reported, as that will keep us on the safe side. At the present ratio of representation our General Conference would be composed of one hundred and fifty-one delegates, which would be one for every 4580 church members, and every fifty traveling and local preachers.

Now, if you will compare these figures with the figures of other churches, especially Old School Presbyterian, you will see that we have far less (about four times less) representation, travel, expense, and (not quite that ratio of time at the General Conference) meetings than the Old School Presbyterians. According to their reports at their last General Assembly, (as published in the Banner of Peace, June 23, 1859,) they have 259,335 communicants. The number of ministers I cannot now give, as I have no statement before me. Now their last General Assembly was composed of about (don't recollect the precise number) 250 delegates, or nearly one for every 1000 members. They have about four times as many delegates per membership meet four times as often, and have about six times as much traveling as our delegates, and more than six times the expense, and sit from one-half to two-thirds longer, if not twice as long as our delegates.

But is all this too much? more than the interests of their church demand? Do they lose or gain by this travel, expense, consumption of time, interchange of thought, consultation, review of the interests of their Church? My own opinion is, they gain largely.

My opinion too, is, that our church would do well, better than it does in some particulars, if our delegation were double what it is, and our General Conference met biennially. If it would not, we might presume that the abolition of the General Conference would be best.

But the increase of delegation, as suggested, would bring together a greater amount of intellect, intelligence, and experience, perhaps twice as much as is usually present. "In the multitude of counsellors there is safety," if the Bible is the safe teacher. And how much more good might and would have been done, if our representation had been greater, I am not prepared to say; but I am inclined to the opinion that a great deal more, spiritually, religiously, and in plans for enlarged usefulness as a church.

Again: At our last General Conference there were nine large committees composed of one delegate from each Annual Conference; and when the list of delegates is looked over, (where we had one for every fourteen traveling preachers,) there were only six Conferences which had delegates enough to send one to each committee without having some one or more or two or more committees, and sixteen Conferences where one delegate had to be on from two to five committees. Will any man pretend to say that all the interests of the Church in these several Conferences were fully represented in all these committees? Suppose the delegates from two or three or more Conferences were asked, what prompted the Committee on Books and Periodicals to report the plan for the business of the Publishing-house and Conference Depositories? Could they tell? So we might ask in reference to some other committees. But if we had as many more from those Conferences, either of traveling preachers, local preachers, or laymen, there would have been a more extended and correct knowledge of the business of the Conference and interests of the Church, as there reviewed and understood throughout the Church.

Again: From my point of observation, it seems to me that our General Conference ought to meet biennially. Why? Because the business transacted at General Conference seems to demand it. Very few General Conferences have closed under a four weeks' session, and sometimes longer than that. And from my observation at last General Conference, I do not doubt but that five weeks could have been judiciously filled, if all the business presented by the committees had been faithfully, judiciously, and religiously attended to. But such long sessions weary some good men, who get restless and lidgety, and leave. Others, who stay, are impatient; and, to prevail on them to stay till the end of the session, the business is hurried through, and done up so slovenly that every men sees before he gets home that some of it was wrongly done. The last General Conference was in session four weeks and one day; and the interests of the Church, at that time, demanded that we should have finished the fifth week there! But the patience and proper discretion of many delegates were so worn out that we closed, to save our credit as ministers of the Church, lest we should meet the next morning and be without a quorum.

Now if our General Conference came off once in two years, the business might be done in from two to three weeks, and be well done, and all the delegates remain to see the end and take a part in the last act.

Perhaps some will say I am for removing the "old landmarks," and that "Young America" wants to be going too fast. But have there been no changes since the first General Conference, in 1784? From that date till 1808, all the elders were members of the General Conference, which met annually. Then a change came; and I honestly believe that a change for the better might be made again. The extremes were annually and quadrennially. Now let us take the middle ground, and see if it will not do better than either of the others.

I should like to see the views of others, of the older as well as younger members and ministers of our Church, on the points presented in this document. Arguments pro and con are asked. SOUTHERN.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE INSTITUTE.

We condense from the Crusader and the National American, Atlanta, Georgia:

WEDNESDAY, July 27, 1859.

The Education Institute of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met this morning at the City Hall, and having been called to order by Vice President, Rev. A. L. Hamilton, was opened with prayer by Rev. J. M. Bonnell. Professor Price was appointed Secretary.

The following is a list of the members present:

Rev. M. M. Henkle, D.D., Tennessee; Rev. J. M. Bonnell, President Female College, Macon, Georgia; Profs. C. Schwartz, C. W. Smith, and F. X. Forster, Macon; Prof. W. D. Williams, Academy for the Blind, Macon; Rev. A. L. Hamilton, D.D., Clarksville Female College, Clarksville, Tennessee; Prof. Dodd, Lexington, Kentucky; Rev. S. W. Moore, Grenada, Mississippi; Rev. W. J. Sasnett, D.D.; Profs. W. H. C. Price and J. Darbey, East Alabama Male College, Auburn, Ala.; Rev. Dr. Means, Atlanta, Georgia; Pres. W. E. Harris, Profs. E. R. Dickson, and Dr. H. T. Heard, La Grange Female College, La Grange, Georgia; Prof. J. R. Mayson, Atlanta, Georgia; Profs. J. S. Stewart, G. A. Orr, and L. N. Smith, Emory, College, Oxford, Georgia; Pres. W. A. Rogers, Griffin, Georgia; L. D. Palmer, Burke, county, Georgia; Rev. R. B. Lester, Atlanta, Georgia; Pres. J. L. Pierce and Rev. Prof. W. C. Bass, Madison Female College, Madison, Georgia; J. W. Stansell, Carrollton, Georgia; Rev. J. M. Wright, Glennville, Alabama.

A considerable number of new members were added to the Institute, and complied with the requirements of the Constitution. Prof. C. Schwarlz, was on motion, appointed Assistant Secretary. President Bonnell presented to the Institute, in behalf of Dr. Rivers, Florence, Alabama, a new work on Moral Philosophy, especially adapted to the institutions of the South. Messrs. Williams, Moore, and Forester, were appointed a committee to arrange business for the Institute. Prof. Dodd asked the favor of having a committee appointed to examine and report on his series of Mathematical works, which was granted, and to give him an opportunity for delivering an essay on the study of Mathematics. Messrs. Dodd, Bonnell, and Rogers were appointed as a publishing committee.

A special complimentary resolution was passed, inviting all teachers, clergymen, and editors of Atlanta to attend the sittings of the Institute, and that the press be invited to report the proceedings as fully as they chose. In the afternoon much interesting business was transacted. The Institute fixed upon Atlanta as the permanent place for its meeting in future, and resolved to establish a library in connection with the body. Such a compliment to our city the good citizens cannot fail to value. The remarkable accessibility of Atlanta as the terminus of many railroads, its rapid and unprecedented growth as a commercial mart, and, its exceeding healthfulness, vindicate the wisdom of localizing the Institute at this point. Our hearty thanks are due the body, and we venture not too much to pledge that our citizens will always be found ready to contribute to the comfort and happy sojourn of the delegation that may annually honor us with their presence.

An interesting report on certain text-books was read by Prof. Bonnell, of Macon, Georgia.

At night an interesting lecture on Mathematics was delivered by Prof. Dodd, of Lexington, Kentucky.

Rev. M. M. Henkle, President, read on Thursday morning a very interesting paper on the several objects which the Institute has in view, which, after having been attentively listened to, was, on motion of Rev. Dr. Hamilton, referred to a committee of three, consisting of Messrs. Sasnett, as Chairman, and Pearce and Harris.

Rev. Dr. Wright, of Glennville, Alabama, then read a document on the Claims of Authors of Hebrew Text-books. This was a most excellent production, and, judging from the attentiveness of the audience, was highly appreciated.

At the appointed hour Rev. Dr. A. Means, delivered one of his masterly discourses on University Education, and the necessity of a great Methodist Southern University. One might as well try to stop a locomotive in its career, or to catch a flash of lightening, as to try to transfer to paper those brilliant flashes of thought and imagination, delivered with such force and power. It was such an effort as only Dr. Means can make, and was received with the most flattering demonstrations of applause and satisfaction.

To the Protestant Episcopal Church two years ago, our city offered twenty-five thousand dollars for the location of a similar institution at this point. The same liberality may be exhibited again.

Our last report brought the proceedings down to the hour of adjournment on Thursday noon. On re-assembling in the afternoon, Prof. Sasnett offered a resolution, which was passed, favoring the equalization of the rates of tuition for all classes and studies, fixing the rates at a figure at which the aggregate income would amply remunerate teachers. No discussion was had, but the reasons advanced in favor of this proposition are cogent, and will be laid before our readers at a future time.

A brief and convincing report was read by Rev. Dr. Means, Chairman of the Committee on the establishment of an Educational Journal in this city. This was the question of the session, on which there was the most difference of opinion, and, consequently, eliciting the most discussion. Dr. Means, on concluding the reading of the report, made a most enthusiastic and effective speech in behalf of the Journal, which was listened to with much interest. In accordance with a proposition contained in the report, at the conclusion of his speech thirteen members of the Institute pledged one hundred dollars each towards the establishment of the Journal. Speeches were then made by Messrs. Sasnett, Bonnell, Hamilton, Henkle, and Payne, but as nothing definite could be arrived at, the subject was, on motion, postponed until Friday morning.

Dr. A. L. Hamilton then entertained the Institute and audience with a speech on the Education of Females, in which he suggested that the physical development of the sex was too much neglected, and that amendment was needed. His remarks were somewhat discursory, but suggestive and forcibly delivered. A bold, strong thinker, conscious of mental power and energetic in delivery, he is a very effective speaker. He did not design to develop any elaborate plan, but only desired to enter his caveat in order to protect his claims to priority, and promised to elucidate his plans more fully in the future. His general plan, however, embraces the establishment of one or more institutions for the education of females, with industrial departments, properly endowed. He would combine the useful with the beautiful, the industrial with the ornamental, that the physical powers might be developed and strengthened, and the sex prepared for the reverses so often attendant on life.

The Institute then adjourned to eight o'clock P. M., at which hour it convened, when an essay was read by Prof. John Darby, of Auburn, Alabama, on "The Position of the Natural Science in our System of Education."

The Institute adjourned to nine o'clock Friday morning.

At the appointed hour the Institute met, when the Educational Journal was again the subject of discussion, in which the forenoon was taken up. In addition to most of yesterday's speakers, Messrs. Darby, L. M. Smith, Price, and Bishop Andrew participated, but still with no result. The subject was again postponed until three o'clock P. M.

Before adjourning, invitations were extended by the Directors of the Mineral Spring Company to visit their grounds, and by the Faculty of the Atlanta Medical College to visit that Institution. The invitations having been accepted, the Institute adjourned.

At three o'clock P. M. the Institute met, when it was ascertained that nineteen gentlemen had pledged one hundred dollars each, leaving but six to be secured.

Resolutions were then introduced and passed, authorizing the selection by ballot of five members as a Publishing committee, which, as soon as fifteen hundred cash subscribers were obtained, was empowered to arrange all the details, and commence the publication of a Journal. The following gentlemen were then elected by ballot as a Publishing Committee, viz: J. M. Bonnell, Macan; A. Means, Atlanta; W. J. Sasnett, Auburn, Ala. G. J. Pierce, Oxford; and G. B. Haygood, Atlanta. Subsequently, by unanimous request of the Committee, E. E. Rawson, Esq., of Atlanta, was added to the Committee.

A resolution was offered thanking Dr. Rivers for a copy of his work on Moral Philosophy; and another, tendering general thanks to other authors for similar favors.

A report on various works on Chemistry was then read by Professor Price, the Secretary of the Institute, which was received and adopted.

An essay was then read by the venerable and learned President, Rev. M. M. Henkle, on "The Anglo-Saxon as an Element of the English Language." This paper was listened to with unflagging interest by every one present. But, one opinion was pronounced, that of unqualified commendation. It bore marks of profound research and scholarship, and an intimate acquaintance with the subject, containing most appropriate and impressive examples in illustration of the power and opulence of the Anglo-Saxon tongue. If the Institute had accomplished nothing more than the production of this one Essay, at its session just closed, it would have been amply repaid for the sacrifices made by the members. Such satisfactory essays must and will tell upon the educated mind, and prove highly useful to those in search of knowledge.

At the conclusion of the reading of this essay, the Institute adjourned to meet at eight o'clock—in the interval paying the visit to the Mineral Spring, whither they were conveyed in carriages provided by O. H. Jones, Esq., where they passed an hour or so in the enjoyment of social intercourse and refreshments suited to the pleasant guests, by the Spring's Company.

Having assembled again at eight o'clock, the closing hours were spent in bringing up and disposing of the unfinished business, and passing the usual resolutions. A lengthy treatise on the "Calculus," the production of Dr. Garland of Alabama, and said to be one of the most masterly efforts of this distinguished mathematician and scholar, was ordered to be printed in pamphlet form. An essay by Professor Jones, as well as a mass of other manuscripts, was handed over to the Committee on Publication. The following resolution was unanimously adopted by a rising vote:

"Resolved, That the thanks of the Institute be returned to the Mayor and Council of the city of Atlanta, for their kindness in giving us the use of the City Hall, and also to the citizens of the place for the generous hospitality extended to the members of the Institute; and that this resolution be published in the city papers."

Thus has ended the first session in Atlanta of an Institute, now permanently located here, whose future transactions we hope will prove a blessing to our race now and hereafter, and eminently advantageous to our city.

It has seldom been our privilege to mingle with more agreeable and intelligent gentlemen in any deliberative body. It numbers among its delegates some of the most learned and distinguished teachers of the Southern States. Its deliberations have been of the most dignified and intelligent nature, and all of its transactions have been well matured and thoroughly canvassed. If we understand its objects, it is designed primarily to elevate the standard of education; to erect a broad and firm platform of Southern text-books upon which all the teachers of the South may stand and battle together for the public good; and, finally, to further the great and commanding interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In this movement, it is safe to predict that there are the elements of power and great good, glimmerings of a light that, by the blessing of God, is to illuminate the land and make a signal mark upon the historic page of Southern progress. Herein we discover the secret of true power and independence from all foreign quarters. Far be it from us, in a discussion like the present, to appeal to sectional prejudices or to arouse any unjust animosities. In fact, a just and not illiberal self-respect, taken in conjunction with the great and increasing wants of the South, demand a brave step higher in the cause of Southern Education.

The following officers have been elected for next year.

Rev. M. M. Henkle, D.D., Tennessee, President; A. L. Hamilton, D.D., Clarksville, Tenn., First Vice President; Rev. Dr. Means, Atlanta, Georgia, Second Vice President; Rev. Wm. L. Sasnett, D.D., Auburn, Alabama, Third Vice President; Rev. J. B. Dodd, Lexington, Kentucky, Fourth Vice President; Prof. J. Darby, Auburn, Alabama, Fifth Vice President; Prof. W. H. C. Price, Auburn, Alabama, Recording Secretary; Prof. J. M. Bonnell, Macon, Georgia, Corresponding Secretary; Prof. G. A. Orr, Oxford, Georgia, Treasurer.

INTERESTING COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. Editor: Some two or three years since, I conceived the idea of preparing a volume for publication, which should contain cases of remarkable awakening and conversion; setting forth unmistakably the fact, there is now a divine power at work in the earth achieving the salvation of sinners. Such a volume, I thought, would be very useful. A number of brethren promised me assistance in the work, and several furnished interesting communications. But circumstances have induced me to abandon the project for the present. Some of these communications possess too much interest to be allowed to perish unread by the public. I have therefore concluded to send them to you; and, if published, I can still preserve them for future use, should it be determined to use them as first intended. They are from ministers in several different States. J. HAMILTON.

T. R. was a merchant residing in Demopolis, Ala. He was a man who possessed some good traits of character, but unfortunately he had fallen into habits of intemperance and debauchery, until he had become a moral wreck. He never attended church, avoided religious company, embraced skeptical principles, and had nearly destroyed his life as well as his soul, having had an attack of delirium tremens.

He had a very pious sister, Mrs. V. residing in Tuskaloosa in 1838, she was a member of the Methodist Church, and one of the purest spirits I have ever known. This sister often wrote pious letters to him, but he would thrust them into his pocket unread; he was so averse to religion that her letters were an annoyance to him. On a certain occasion, his sister set apart a day of fasting and prayer, shutting herself up in the room for the purpose of making special prayer for his conversion. That day, he was on a steamboat on the Warrior River, on his way to Tuskaloosa. He told me that at the close of the day while he was lying in his birth, suddenly, he saw himself, in his imagination, going right into hell! It appeared as vivid as though a reality. It came upon him with such an awful sense of guilt and danger, that he sprang from his birth and began to cry for mercy, calling upon all to pray for him. Rev. Thomas A. Smith, a local preacher of Tuskaloosa, was on board, and prayed and labored with him nearly all night, till he became calm—and Brother Smith thought he began to entertain some hope. A little after day-light, he went out on the guards of the boat and plunged into the river with all his clothes on, and an overcoat, endeavoring to drown himself; but the captain sent a boat after him and saved his life. From that time a total change was wrought in him.

When he arrived at Tuskaloosa he joined the church, and became an exemplary member, and has continued to be so.

He subsequently returned to Pennsylvania, his native State, where he now resides.

He told me, himself, that notwithstanding he had been such a slave to intemperance, he had not the least desire to drink ardent spirits since his conversion. I had the above facts from Dr. R. L. Kennon who was residing in Tuskaloosa at the time, from Rev. Thos. A. Smith who was on the boat, and from his own mouth. I was intimately acquainted with all the parties.

He informed me that on the morning he went out on the guard of the steamboat, the impression was made upon his mind, that if he died then he would be saved, having felt some sense of peace. But that if he went back to Demopolis, among his old associates, they would lead him back to his former habits, and he would be lost; and, under this impulse, he tried to drown himself.

This is one of the most singular cases I have ever known and demonstrates the power of prayer, and the agency of the Holy Spirit. G. SHARPER.

NAMES OF DAYS—THEIR ORIGIN.

The idols which our Saxon ancestors worshiped—from which the days of the week derive their names—were various, and were the principal motives to their adoption:

The Idol of the Sun.—This idol, which represented the glorious luminary of the day, was the chief object of their worship. It is described like the bust of a man upon a pillar, holding, with outstretched arms, a burning wheel before his breast. The first day of the week was especially dedicated to its adoration, which they termed the Sun's Day, hence is derived the word Sunday.

The Idol of the Moon.—The next was the idol of the moon, worshiped on the Second day of the week, called the Moon's Day; and since by us Monday. The form of this idol is intended to represent a woman, habited in a short coat and a hood, having two long ears. The moon which she holds in her hand represents the quality.

The Idol of Tuisco.—Tuisco was first deified as the father and ruler of the Tentonic race, but in the course of time he was worshiped as the son of Earth. From this came the Saxon word Tuisco's Dag, which we call Tuesday. He is represented as standing on a pedestal, an old, venerable sage, clothed in the skin of an animal, holding a scepter in his right hand.

The Idol of Woden, or Odin.—Woden, or Odin, was the supreme divinity of the Northern nations. This hero is supposed to have emigrated from the East, but from what country, or at what time, is not known. His exploits form the great part of the mythological creed of the Northern nations, and his achievements are magnificent beyond all credibility. The name of the fourth day of the week, called by the Saxons Woden's Dag, and by us Wednesday, is derived from this personage. Woden is represented in a martial attitude, with a broad sword uplifted in his right hand.

The Idol Thor.—Thor, the eldest and bravest of the sons of Woden and Frige, was, after his parents, considered the greatest among the Saxons and Danes. To him the fifth day of the week, called Thor's Dag, and by us Thursday, was consecrated. Thor is represented as sitting upon a throne, with a crown of gold upon his head, adorned with a circle in front, wherein were set twelve bright burnished stars, and with a regal scepter in his right hand.

The Idol Friga, or Frea.—Friga, or Frea, was the wife of Woden, or Odin, and, next to him, the most reverend divinity among the heathen Saxons, Danes, and Northern nations. In the most ancient times, Friga, or Frea, was the same with the goddess Hertha, or Earth. To her the sixth day of the week was consecrated, which by the Saxons was written Friga's Dag, corresponding with our Friday. Friga was represented with a drawn sword in her right hand.

The Idol Seater.—The Idol Seater is represented on a pedestal, whereon is placed a perch, on the sharp prickled back of which he stood. His head was uncovered, and his visage lean. In his left hand he held up a wheel, and in his right hand was a pail of water, wherein were flowers and fruits; and his dress consisted of a long coat, girded with linen. The appellation given to the day of his celebration is still retained. The Saxons named it Seater's Dag, which we call Saturday.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

"ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND TESTAMENTS FOR THE ARMIES."

Within a few days we have received letters from different quarters, inquiring as to a circular just issued by the American Bible Union, under the above title. Not a few, it is said, receive it and contribute as if it came from the American Bible Society. We wish simply to say that we have nothing to do with it; that it goes out from the rooms of our Baptist brethren in Broome St., who have published Dr. Achilli's Italian Testament, with baptizo translated as they think it ought to be. As for our Society, we will add that we have published the Italian Testament of Diodati, at Geneva, and have instructed our friends there and at Paris to furnish Italy and the armies liberally with the Scriptures, and rely on us for aid.

Furthermore, one of the Secretaries of this society has just sailed for Europe, to confer with the British and Foreign Bible Society (which is already at work in this matter,) and with the societies at Paris and Geneva, and is instructed to do all which can be done, in Bible circulation, at this juncture.—Bible Society Record.

DEATH OF THE QUEEN OF PORTUGAL.

Death is busy with the crowned heads of Europe. To the list of dead monarchs is added the name of the young Queen of Portugal, who died July 16, having just completed her 22d year. The Queen, baptized by the name Stephanie Federiqua Antoinette, was the daughter of Prince Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen. But little more than a year since, the foreign illustrated papers published elaborate accounts of her marriage. The ceremony was performed by proxy at the Church of St. Hedwidge, in Berlin, April 29, 1858, and in person at Lisbon on the 18th of May. Passing through England, on her way to Portugal, the Princess became the guest of Queen Victoria, and attracted much of the popular attention, from her beauty and winning manners. Stephanie's early life was not courtly. She was brought up in a little Suabian country town, where her father resided until 1848; but after the Revolution, the house became established at Dusseldorf, and the royal alliance was contracted at Berlin a year ago. The Queen's birthday falls on the 15th of July; she died on the 16th.

Terms—$2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 31, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

The volumes of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with each year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to the same rule.

Therefore, new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will please send, not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of Four Cents a Week.

Then, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable reformation. It is an approximation to the cash system, without objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.—Not a case of yellow fever up to this date. Weather warm but tempered by breeze and shower. Would not advise the return of the unacclimated yet, as it is not too late for the appearance of fevers.

THE FIELD IS ENLARGING.

Within half a century, the sphere of human activity has been greatly enlarged. If we were to make a catalogue of those articles which have recently been introduced into general use, and now occupy thousands of persons in their production, it would amaze us to find how enormous an addition they had made to the field of human industry. The little match that lights your fire; the steel pen with which you write; the universal clock on the mantel; the piano, that has now become a common piece of furniture; the new farming-machines; the manufacture of india-rubber and gutta-percha; the arts of photographing; the whole system of rapid locomotion; to say nothing of the vast extension of cheap literature, and of the widening domain of science; have created a demand for skill and labor, that can hardly be supplied.

But while this wonderful expansion has been going on in trade and commerce, there has been an opening equally remarkable in the moral and religious world for all forms of intellectual and spiritual activity. The former, indeed, exists for the latter; and hence, whenever we see a new and mighty stimulus applied to the external interests of civilization, we may be sure that Providence is preparing the way for the Church to put on her garments of strength, to gird her loins afresh for more vigorous and extended efforts, and to witness more signally, as a working power, the grandeur of her position as the representative of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is a greater thing than ever before to be a Christian, if we look at a Christian's earthly attitude, and mark his opportunities to be useful. A good man can do more than a hundred dollars in one day, to advance the cause of Christ, than his grandfather could do with a thousand; and yet a thousand can be more easily made now than a hundred then. A good man, who has a cultivated intellect, who can speak and write for religion, has the means at command to effect far more than could have been effected half a century since, through the same instrumentality. So of every useful agency. Power has been multiplied; and, humanly speaking, the capacity for wider men, better men, nobler and more elevated men has been greatly enlarged. "Five talents," therefore, have a meaning now they never had before, and "one talent" has a much deeper significance. For if there is anything peculiarly marked in the recent progress of society, it is this, viz: the opening for usefulness on the part of humble means and ordinary abilities. This, we say, is the most striking feature of the age, if viewed in its moral aspects. The common endowments have gained, so to speak, on the uncommon endowments; the man of talent can do more proportionally than the man of genius; and the whole tendency of things for fifty years past, has steadily moved in the direction of bringing forward into more impressive prominence, the "one talent" as a means of active usefulness.

We shall not now take a survey of the foreign field, which has been thrown open to the Church. Suffice it, for the present, to look at home. Let us merely view the position of the Church as related to two vast facts, then, notice the great work which the Church has now to perform in training her members to appreciate as they ought the importance of consecrating their "secular" business to God. Not only as respects the Christian character of the members, but as respects also the means of usefulness, she has a most solemn charge committed to her intelligence and zeal. If men realize the responsibilities of stewardship; if they come to feel that whatever they possess is redeemed just as much as their souls are redeemed, and that property, no less than personality, will enter into the account of the last day; if they are led to know, in the scriptural sense of knowing, that they will be judged by their works, although saved only by the blood of Christ, and that they must carry the Cross into their business as well as into everything else; this great inward work can only be wrought through the fidelity of the Church in her modes of instruction and training. It is the office of the Church to awaken the consciences of men on this subject, and to bring them to feel the tremendous pressure of divine obligations on all they have, no less than on what they are. To give our hearts to God includes the giving of all to which those hearts can cling, and certainly there is nothing more likely to involve our affections than worldly goods. Here, then, is a vast mission for the Church. It is one that has been sadly neglected. It is one over which the Church has guiltily slumbered. But, at last, she is awakening. A more earnest tone begins to pervade our preaching and writing on this vital duty, and we can now indulge the hope that we are entering on an era in which business will be contemplated in a higher and holier light. Let us then press home the great truth, that men have no more right to be selfish, worldly, carnal in their business, than to be selfish, worldly, carnal in any other relation, in any other interest, in any other work. Let us teach and exhort, in all long-suffering impatience, that consecrated hearts are a delusion and a mockery, without consecrated property. The other part of the proposed discussion, we must, for brevity's sake, embody in another article in this paper.

But meanwhile, let us reflect on what a work we have just here to perform and by Christ's help, let us all unite to form a true, spiritual sentiment in the Church on this momentous topic.

CONSECRATING OUR PROPERTY.

The greatest work that Christianity has now to accomplish within the Church, is to bring the hearts of its members under the full influence of the great truth, that their property must be consecrated to God. This vital truth has been so much neglected; its position in the system of the gospel has been so strangely disregarded; its experimental and practical power has been so imperfectly felt, that really when good men take pains to examine its aspects as presented in God's word, and to look themselves to its instructions, it is as though a new revelation had been made from the Holy Ghost to their inmost spirits. All of us believe, in a certain sense, that we are God's stewards, that our business is a religious thing, that our property is God's gift. But when we come to the practical application of these momentous principles, our faith is scarcely strong enough to grasp them as tangible realities, and in all but rare cases, they almost utterly fail to take their place among the recognized rules of daily living.

Stewardship is that view of life which consecrates our industry, our business, our prosperity to God. It is not satisfied with a general acknowledgment that we are the Lord's, and that we should serve him. But, so far as our daily work and its results are concerned, it moves our hearts to a deep sense of that responsibility under which they put us as God's redeemed creatures, who owe to Him their labor and its fruits. Hence, all industry, that is, Christian industry, glorifies God in two modes: first, by providing for its own wants; and, secondly, by providing means with which to advance Christ's cause. If it fail in either point, it cannot ordinarily be called Christian industry.

We are not to follow earthly callings as men. We are to follow them as redeemed men, or they never can prove to be God's means to elevate our character and life. All our work, no matter what its conventional dignity or temporal benefits, is degrading, if it simply be our work—thorns and thistles are its harvest. And, therefore, there is but one way in which it can escape being a curse, viz: by consecrating it to God. The most of persons look on business as a system standing apart from the Cross of Sacrifice, and having no close, intimate, holy relation to the purposes of human trial and probation. But this is a sad misconstruction of God's truth. Business is a prominent part of stewardship, and no greater task is assigned us than to make to ourselves "friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," and secure a retreat in their "habitations." The progress of our spiritual life is inseparably connected with the consecration of our business to God. No use of the means of grace will ensure a man's divine growth, if he fails to dedicate his prosperity to Jesus Christ. Our worldly affairs make the stronghold of selfishness, they resist the spirit of sacrifice; they encourage the spirit of earthliness; and many men who flatter themselves as being willing to devote their other talents to God's service, are guilty of fearful remissness in failing to consecrate their business to the cause of Christ.

The first use of property is doubtless to provide for our earthly necessities, both present and prospective, subject to the condition, that we so provide for ourselves as God's servants. But there is another use of property. There are other necessities besides our own; and hence, our property, whether small or large, is sinfully held and sinfully used, if it never answer any other than personal and family ends. The rights of God, in this respect, are just as sacred as his right to our love and reverence; nor can any true man feel that he is supporting himself or his family, in any Christian view of support, if he contributes not a fair and full share of his productive industry to the treasury of the Lord. A man must bring the claims of God into all his business, as well as the claims of himself and family, or that business is not a part of his Christian discipline here, or a part of his Christian reward hereafter.

Brethren—hearken to these words. Believe us when we declare to you, that the Sabbath needs the working-days of the week as much as these working-days need the Sabbath. Believe us, the closet and the family altar need the sanctifying spirit of business, just as much as business needs the sanctifying spirit of the closet and the family altar. You have forgotten this law of reciprocal action. You have forgotten that grace flows to us through these means of daily toil and labor, as well as through those other channels. And remember this fact, viz: if you would be blest on the Sabbath, and in the private affairs of Christianity, you must not fail of God's blessing in your business. The best evidence of that blessing is experienced when you find your business enlarging your heart to give; and be sure to press this truth to your soul, that you are a successful man, not by what you make, but by what you make and then give to Christ.

OUR QUARTERLY REVIEW.

There is nothing more certain than the fact that the main work of a Christian Church, is to preach the gospel, administer the means of grace, and labor for souls as the redeemed property of Jesus Christ. And it is equally certain that if this work is well performed, the intellectual and spiritual power of the Church will be constantly increased. Nor is there any thing in which this growing influence will more strikingly manifest itself than in its social functions. By social functions we mean those forms of activity, those operations of mind, which bear in its own membership, and on those who are socially under its control, not immediately and directly as means of salvation, but as great helps to personal and general culture. If we have to convert men, we have also to train men after conversion for usefulness and effective service. If we have to preach the gospel, we have also to magnify that gospel in all its relations to intellect, to society, to literature and life. It is just here that we see the immense importance of the social functions of the Church; and hence, as a Church expands—rising higher towards the divine idea of its constitution and office—developing its latent resources, and furnishing itself for its great mission—it will evince its augmenting strength in the discharge of these weighty duties.

We begin to see and feel these vast obligations. Our schools, Colleges, newspapers, are gospels of this awakening spirit in the Church. The right path has been struck, and we are treading it with advancing footsteps. But yet, it is quite apparent that we have not taken such large and liberal views of this subject as become our character, our position, our prospects. The voice of the Church ought to be heard through literature, as the voice of the Church is heard in the pulpit, contending earnestly and eloquently for such truths as it deems vital and significant, witnessing for light against darkness, for Christ against Anti-christ, and striving to make itself felt in the household, in the library, in the halls of learning, as well as in the sanctuary. Such sentiments are progressing among us. Nevertheless, there in need for higher thoughts, for a deeper sense of responsibility, for more generous sensibilities in respect to this subject.

But we can now do no more than call attention to the Quarterly Review, under the able management of Dr. Summers. The object of this Review is to contribute to the intellectual and spiritual culture of the Church in a specific way, viz: by the publication of such reviews, and other literary matter, as may tend to inform the Church in the literature of the day. Its appeal is to the thinkers in the Church, and to such as are anxious to become thinkers, on the leading topics of the time. Of course, such a work cannot address itself to the great body of superficial readers. Its aim is altogether more elevated. It discusses grave themes. It proposes to ascend to fountains, not to linger about the streams in the lowlands. On this account, its readers must be a somewhat limited circle; but there is no reason, except in indifference to a most praiseworthy interest, why this circle of readers should not be much larger than at present. What the Review needs is simply this, viz: an enlargement of its patronage among two classes—our ministry, and our educated men among the laity. Secure this object, and there will be no difficulty on the score of the best quality of contributions. Literary men cannot write as a general thing unless they are paid, and no set of men earn their pay more laboriously or more honorably. The power to write a great article for a Review is a rare gift; it demands immense toil; and it ought to be amply remunerated. But this state of things cannot be brought about, unless a fine patronage is first obtained; and we do therefore entreat our brethren to urge this enterprise on, and not let it languish. One of our deepest convictions is, that the time is fast approaching, when Methodism will have to do just such a work, intellectually, as she has had to do, spiritually, in the generations recently past, and now progressing. Unmistakable signs point out this future for us. Providence is preparing us for a powerful action on the mind as well as on the heart of the world; and it is in anticipation of this movement that we urge on all our friends to sustain our literature.

BISHOP PIERCE—WHERE HE IS, WHAT HE IS DOING.

The Pacific Methodist of the 22d July says: In answer to the enquiries of our brethren as to the whereabouts of Bishop Pierce, we state that he is in San Francisco, and will remain for this week. He is detained here for reasons imperative in their character. Anxious as he is to start on a general tour of labor in the several districts, he could not do so sooner without a sacrifice of interests of permanent importance and dear to the whole Church.

He is endeavoring to secure a house of worship for us in this city—a work necessary but difficult, requiring time and much labor. The times are dull—our own people are poor—few of our outside friends are able or willing to contribute large amounts—a multitude of people must be hunted up, talked to and solicited. The only alternative therefore is to postpone the effort, or remain long enough to give the enterprise a fair trial. We know the brethren will have but one opinion with regard to the course to be pursued. There can be no turning back in this movement for a Church. It is that which of all things we need most, and should call forth, if need be, the concentrated efforts of the whole connection. We think success will be realized. Not a man who has thus far been applied to, has refused to contribute—but to raise twenty thousand dollars by hundreds, fifties, twenties and fives, is what cannot be done in a day.

There is another cause of detention. A revival of religion has manifested itself here in connection with the Bishop's labors. Our little chapel is crowded every evening; the Church is awake and zealous; penitents are at the altar, and tears of contrition are being shed. The power of God is seen and acknowledged by all beholders. The interest appears to be increasing, and we hope the time for a genuine revival is at hand in San Francisco. Let all praying people remember us in their approaches to the throne of grace.

Next week, Bishop Pierce will leave this city. Of his route, he will give due notification. We are sure that no one, acquainted with the facts in the premises, will think that San Francisco has had an undue share of his labors.

DEPARTURE OF MISSIONARIES.

Welearn, says the North Carolina Christian Advocate, from an authentic source that the following arrangement is proposed, for the departure of several missionaries from the Southern Methodist Church, to China and Japan.

Rev. M. L. Wood, selected from the N. C. Conference, for the China mission, not being an elder, can only be elected and ordained at an Annual Conference. The session of the N. C. Conference will not be held until December. The presiding Bishop will therefore transfer Brother Wood to the Tennessee Conference, which is to meet at Columbia on the 12th of October. So soon as he is examined and ordained, he will again be transferred to the N. C. Conference. It is also understood that the two missionaries from the Memphis Conference, whose names are not given, will be ordained at the same time, and be ready to go to Japan. Rev. Messrs. Allen, of the Georgia Conference, and Stewart, of the Tennessee Conference, are likewise in readiness to go as missionaries to China. And it is proposed that these five missionaries shall sail for their destination in China and Japan, early in November. It is expected that they will sail in the same vessel with the Rev. M. T. Yates, who will then return to the Baptist mission at Shanghae.

Such an arrangement is in every way judicious. The long voyage will be in the most favorable season of the year. The young missionaries will have the benefit of the society of Rev. M. T. Yates and his family, and will thus be enabled to make some progress in preparation for their arduous duties.

Let the Churches contemplate this spectacle—the departure of five devoted men to live and labor and die as missionaries to the heathen—and then let all be moved to pray, "Lord, send forth more laborers into thy vineyard."

THE CHILDREN'S UNIVERSITY.

This grand institution has been in operation for several years. Like the greatest Universities in Europe, it is not all in one building, but occupies many for its courses of instruction. Generally, these edifices are not very large or imposing in external appearance; though some of them are very fine. But most of them are modest, unpretending-looking buildings, scattered here and there all over the land. Many of them are even built of logs; but in all, the same studies are pursued and similar text-books are used. The main thing taught is the Science of Salvation. The tuition is always free. In the Methodist division of this magnificent University of the South, there are over one hundred and fifty thousand pupils! It has a faculty of near twenty-five thousand instructors! What a glorious army! But then there is a million of boys and girls in the Southern States who have never belonged to any division of this great university. Good people are becoming very much interested for them, and now many branches of this grand institution are springing up all over the country—mostly among people too poor to pay for the necessary books and periodicals.

The Board of Trustees of the Children's University needs, at this moment, $100,000, as a fund, the interest of which may be expended—

1. In publishing new books. That is, increasing the variety for the libraries of this wonderful Institution.

2. To enable them to sell these books at cost, and often below cost to those who can afford to pay but little.

3. To enable us to give them away to those who can pay nothing.

4. To extend the circulation and pay for the printing of the beautiful little organ of the University—the Sunday-school Visitor—the price of which is less than it costs to print it.

We therefore greatly need this publishing fund to endow the libraries of the Children's University. Shall we have it?

The proportion to be raised, according to wealth and numbers, in those Conferences where the Nashville Christian Advocate is most widely circulated, has been estimated as follows:

For the Tennessee Conference	$10,000
For the Kentucky Conference	5,000
For the Louisville Conference	5,000
For the Holston Conference	3,000

Will the Presiding Elders in each of these Conferences please assign the amount, proper to be raised in each district, with reference, to the above estimates? The general average for the whole will be only about $50 for each traveling preacher. Cannot that be realized?

The estimates for the other Conferences will soon be furnished through their several papers.

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

The Supreme Court of Alabama has recently decided that the law by which it was provided that no liquor should be sold within five miles of the Town of Greensboro, where the Southern University is located, is constitutional. This settles the question. The liquor-shops have all been closed, and the door-knobs hung in crape. This decision frees the town from a great nuisance, for five miles; taken them into the open prairie, or into the midst of plantations, whose owners do not wish any dram-shops to corrupt their negroes.

LETTER FROM WILBRAHAM.

Fisk Academy.

We have attended a celebration of this most interesting institution—a star of the first magnitude—which formed a nucleus in the constellation of all the favored ones of our Church in the States where we met our early friends, subjects of the first glorious revival after its establishment, now strong in the Lord—ministers of the gospel of Christ.

We listened with interest to an eloquent address, of high classic character and profound philosophic depth, from a young Christian minister, who finished his collegiate course at the Middletown University—where the sainted Fisk labored until he winged his flight to a fairer clime.

Behind the speaker hung the portrait of the holy philanthropist, with all the expression of that spiritual life which cast a halo of light around his polished brow. It was a season of deep and profitable reflection to think of the past, and to follow the radiations of light which have gone forth from this place belting the earth; and to see what mighty results have been produced from such small beginnings—like the wide-spreading oak with its lofty branches, springing from a little acorn, unobserved in its germinating bud, trampled under foot by a child; or, the mighty river, which has its source in a stream so small that one might scarcely slake his thirst.

Beautiful, indeed, is this quiet nook of a New England village for the student life, where nature has been prodigal of her best gifts—in its verdant lawns, flowing streams, magnificent trees, its lovely woodlands, mountains and sloping hills of park-like verdure, which Old England cannot rival without cultivation. Our shade-trees are unsurpassed by any in Europe. The magnificent Elm, with its columns of gothic grandeur, throws its wide shadow along our rural walks with majesty and grace—while the dense foliage of the mountain-maple, forms an impenetrable shade from the sun's rays.

The rippling stream,
Which flows unseen—
Through the tall grass so green—

adds to the imagery of poetic beauty in a harmony of sounds most pleasant to the ear.

Fisk Hall stands upon a terraced hill close by the old Academy, embowered in shade—a lovely monument to his memory—though unadorned with sculptured marble. His name, engraven upon its walls with the breath of prayer from eloquent lips, touched with hallowed fire from heaven's own altar, and entwined in memory's wreath, is enshrined in every heart which feels his worth.

How many a poor boy has been benefitted by his efforts, brought out from obscurity to sit among the learned and scientific of our land, and now occupy high position among the wise and good.

The Prayer-Meeting.

Delightful is the hour of prayer in a place where the voice of devotion goes up like incense before the throne, among the sweet rural scenes of God's own temple. The gatherings on week days in the peaceful homes of our ancestors for social prayer, has a hallowed influence—a patriarchal bearing—going down like Jacob's blessing upon his sons to future generations—a rich legacy, more durable than earthly possessions, which soon pass away.

The Sunday evenings, when the young and old meet together after the week's toil, to share alike the melting streams of mercy which descend like gentle dews upon the tender herb, and showers upon the mown grass; these out-pourings of the heart are our nation's safety as well as the true source of social and domestic happiness, more powerful than a standing army for our protection, or the sword for our defense. The breath of prayer is sweeter than the fragrance of earth's fairest flowers, for its incense reaches the throne of God—the old are made happy and the young are blest.

The Children's Class-Meeting.

Already has our Church begun to feel the importance of childhood's piety, and is gathering the lambs into the folds of Christ. How many little ones have been converted in childhood, and left to wander in the wilderness world without a shepherd to guide them, or to carry the lambs in his bosom when weary of the way, or to lead them by the still waters, that they may lie down in green pastures and gather flowers which adorn its fields.

Here, in this place, has been a regular Class-meeting for the lambs of the flock for more than a year; quite a number have assembled, from seven to twelve years of age constantly, a lady having the charge; each one telling a simple tale of true experimental religion, which no one could doubt. One little girl of eight years old said she had been connected a year ago, and hoped she should hold out faithful to the end. She has never missed her class once during that time. They have hymn books, and sing most sweetly. It was a scene of peculiar interest, where angels might

"Unperceived mingle with the throng."

Where innocence and beauty were seen to bow in such sweet devotion before the throne of God. A young girl of fifteen, who had been early trained in the path of piety, closed the meeting with an eloquent and appropriate prayer. Here were the tender buds, fresh with the dews of morning, ready to burst forth with the beauty of opening day; and the young girl, already expanded into the bloom of womanhood, sparkling with a dewy diadem under the genial rays of heaven's own light of peerless beauty.

How many mothers delight to witness the graceful step in childhood's dance, and take pleasure in their parties and balls; but how few witness angelic scenes like these? If they are capable of such earthly blessings, are they not equally so of heavenly. S. B. Thomas.

LETTER FROM DOVER N. H.

Cocheco River—Factory Girls—Hard-work and Small Pay—Dry-dock—Steam—The Propeller Franklin—Impertinent Curiosity—"Isms" of the North.

Mr. Editor: For the past week I have made the ancient town of Dover my headquarters. This place is largely engaged in manufacturing—the falls of the Cocheco river affording abundant water-power for the propulsion of extensive machinery. About 1500 girls and 500 men are employed in the cotton mills and printery; and 1000 men are engaged in the manufacture of brogan-shoes for the Southern market.

Truly, "Cotton is king"—the monarch that controls these vast factories. There is no slavery worse than that which necessity institutes; and the pale, haggard faces of many of the factory girls, tell the sad tale of the cruelty of this hard master.

The average wages of the female operatives is not over two dollars and-a-half per week; and, on this scanty subsistence, they must live. For it, they have to work thirteen hours a day—yet, most of them have a horrible idea of the Southern slave—and are the most blatant of of freedom-shriekers. "Where ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise."

On last Saturday I made an excursion in a sail-boat down the noble Piscataqua to Portsmouth navy-yard. The floating dry-dock, built at an expense of over one million of dollars, is a colossal national work and a mammoth curiosity. It is large enough to easily take in the "Great Eastern."

An old sloop of war that, for many years has been watching for slavers and maintaining the dignity of the American flag on the African coast, was in the dock being repaired. On the stocks I saw the mammoth steam-propeller Franklin. She is to carry 90 guns, four of which weigh 1500 lbs. each, and, when launched, will be the finest ship in the American navy. It will take twelve hundred men to "man her." Her engines will be fifteen hundred horse-power. She is nearly completed; and, in case of war, could be afloat with her batteries of death and destruction in a few weeks

For many years the ship "Alabama" has been upon the stocks—but her model is so imperfect—that if launched now, amid fleets of modern improvement, she would be a clumsy craft, and a dishonor to the State whose name she bears. Several frigates of war were being fitted for sea.

The town of Portsmouth is extensively engaged in ship-building, and her vessels have a world-wide reputation for speed and stability. Having satisfied myself with observations in Portsmouth I returned to Dover.

On the Sabbath I attended the Methodist Church, and heard the Rev. Mr. Buckley preach a fine discourse upon the sacrament. He invited me to preach—as I was out on vacation, I declined—but assisted him in the services. I shall be here over to-morrow (Sabbath), and shall, probably, hear him again. During the week, the question has been canvassed, whether the pastor should invite me to fill his pulpit on the succeeding Sabbath.

A great deal of curiosity has been manifested to know whether I owned any "chattels." To pacify them, I told an officious brother, that I should like to have it to tell them that I had fifty, busily at work on a cane-brake plantation in Alabama; but, that unfortunately, I could not.

They will not be likely to insist on my preaching, although I have spent several years in the midst of slavery, endeavoring to teach the negro the way of salvation; while they have been shrieking on bleeding Kansas, and by their pseudo-philanthrophy binding the fetters closer around the slave.

I like the privilege of preaching the gospel to the slave far more than I should to the abolitionist of the "ism," North. I frankly believe, that there is more religion in the "Benny South" than there is in Puritanic New England. There we have no Parkerism, Emmersonianism, Spiritualism, Unitarianism, Woman's Rightism Nazaritism, and a score of other "isms" with which the North is cursed. And all these semi-infidel or fanatical sects are the offspring of the Autocrat of "isms," Abolitionism.

Let us go on in our work of preaching the gospel to the poor—the negro of the South and the Indian of the West—unheeding the Boreas of fanaticism.

On Monday I expect to leave here for the White Mountains. H. A. M. Henderson.

LETTER FROM ANNOTATOR.

Our Town—The Two Mirrors Presenting a Panorama of Current Moral Events—The Levee-system Unsafe—Note one suggested—Its practicability—Crops—Weather.

Our town is pleasantly situated, in pleasant weather—it makes no difference where; its name—it makes no difference what—it is our town, and has a name, Classico-biblical—and this is enough for outsiders to know, about locality and title: and especially, should strangers not be too solicitous to pry into these private matters. With regard to population, I would state that our town contains more or less inhabitants, as the case may be. Sometimes the population is in the comparative, more frequently in the diminutive but never in the superlative. This you will perceive is the physical and not the moral topography of our town; for the latter, as you will presently see on looking into the two mirrors, requires an inversion of degrees.

The population consists of white folks, negroes, "colored people" (free), Dutch and Irish. And now, gentle reader, I am prepared to let you take a peep into one of our mirrors; and in order to prevent mental epilepsy and give you a clearer view of the current moral events of our town, I shall in the first place—as the preachers say—present to you our little mirror, which is only a plain reflector. Now look, stranger, do you not see a neat building—it makes no difference what the materials are, of which it is made—with a belfry, and green window-blinds? That is the Methodist Church. Let us step inside.

It has neat pews, and they are free; a tasty pulpit, the altar (a Methodist Church always has an altar) and the aisles are completed; a gilt chandeller gracefully depends from the ceiling to "give light." "The last bell" is calling out the people to "divine service."

While the minister is going through with the preliminaries, let us reconnoiter a little. Well, the ladies seats are pretty well filled: but what has become of all the men? I only see a dozen or fifteen. Never mind friend, "wait for the wagon;" the other mirror will bring them to view.

In that congregation of ladies there are some very pious and devoted Christians; others that want to be, and a few who are indifferent.

In confirmation of this statement, look through the window into the class-room (a Methodist Church always has a class-room!) and you will see Sisters A. and. B. and C. and D.; and Bros. F. and G.; true-hearted and cross-bearing members. The other members are absent to-day, no doubt, though, they are devotional, perhaps, in their closets.

Now change your position. That other Church you see yonder, a very neat edifice, is the Presbyterian-house of worship. They have no preaching, I believe, for the reason that they have no preacher.

If you think you can now bear the reflection I will elevate our double-convex mirror, and permit you to take a hasty look.

I promised to exhibit some of our male friends. Do you see that large two-story building with an L running off down the other street? That is an hotel, and has as good fare as you will find anywhere. In that hotel is a bar containing all sorts and grades of liquors; and, hard by, is a gambling-hall. Don't you see the men there? Don't you hear them talking and laughing and swearing? Some are drinking, others cursing, and others playing cards. That is the center of attraction in our town. The ladies of course don't go that way now, as it might disturb the gentlemen.

Those three or four men you see out there, are only looking at some fellow that has been shot or stabbed. Only a little gambling scrape—that's all!

Must close down on you for the present; will give you another peep into this mirror some other time.

The present levee system, I regard not only unsafe, but ruinous. Never, in my judgment, can they dam up this inland ocean so as to prevent the waters expanding and submerging vast tracts and sections of the richest lands on the continent.

The floods of the Mississippi, must and will have latitude. Not only this, but see what a ruinous tax must constantly be imposed upon the people to keep up levees. I am credibly informed that a tax of a thousand per cent has actually been set apart by the Levee Board of Carroll Parish, Louisiana, alone, for levee purposes.

Such a tax will force the poorer class to sell out and emigrate; and I hold that any country is cursed that has nothing but rich planters.

But, even this ruinous tax, cannot save the country from overflow. It may protect Carroll and Madison parishes, but it will throw the flood on others. The object is, to fall upon a plan that will protect the whole country. I conceive of but one plan, and that I think entirely impracticable.

It is this: open all the natural out-lets on both sides of the river, and construct gates at the head of every channel so as to graduate the water.

When this is done, the country will be exempt from inundation; the heavy drain upon the public and private resources of the State or States, will cease; the tide of immigration flow afresh and these vast swamps, in the course of a few years, "shall bud and blossom as the rose," and become the most productive and fruitful districts in the world.

Crops in this section of the country, have suffered immensely for want of rain. Corn crops in particular, have been cut short; but cotton is much better, and in some places an immense yield is anticipated.

As to the weather, I leave you to conjecture, remarking that the thermometer has ranged up to this from 90 to 98 degrees. Annotator.

CHRISTIAN HOPE.

How dark and dreary this life would be without Hope to extract the rankling arrow from the weary heart. Neither has she respect for persons or places. What would the home of luxury be without her cheering rays—the lowly cottage, without her seed of promise to shed its fragrance in the heart—or the lonely captive, whose heart aches from sadness? But hope comes, and bids the shadowy form of despair to vanish.

When pleasures all fail and friends pass away,
And our prospects in life should decay;
Though all should depart, let hope still be there,
And never, no never, yield to despair.

Or in the beautiful words of Finly Johnson:

"Though we should be toss'd on life's stormy sea,
And sorrows and dangers around us should be;
Let us be of good cheer, and throw out the last rope,
And fasten it well to the anchor of hope."

But, above all is Hope dearest to the true and loving Christian, whatever may be his lot in life—in prosperity or adversity he is able to withstand every shock, for he has still that cheering companion to brighten his pathway, and guide him safely through life.

To him, the grave is not dark; for it is lighted by the glorious hope—the Christian hope—which, after having conducted the weary traveler to the portals of the immortal world, folds her glittering pinions and closes her radiant eyes. Her mission is filled, and she expires on the threshold of that bright beautiful heaven, which she ever and anon beckoning us on by glimpses of its glory. The flowers of that land fade not—and songs of rapture are never exchanged for notes of sorrow.

How earnestly should we seek for that blessing, above all others. How my heart yearns for the Christian hope to cheer me on through this life of sin and sorrow, to heal the wounds of disappointment, and sow the seeds that promises to unfold the golden gate-way to those who shall dwell in that holy sinless land, with happy angels to strike the golden harp, and join in the everlasting song of praise as we wander along that peaceful stream which "makes glad the City of God."

When thinking of the Christian hope, how often the beautiful lines of Wesley's occur:

"O What a blessed hope is ours!
While here on earth we stay,
We more than taste the heavenly powers
And anticipate that day:
We feel the resurrection near,
Our life in Christ concealed,
And with his glorious presence here
Our earthen vessels filled."

Lake Providence, Aug. 12, 1859. Jessie.

COLLECTIONS FOR THE PUBLISHING HOUSE.

To the Presiding Elders of the Georgia Conference.

Dear Brethren.—Permit me to say that I am directed by the Book Committee to call your attention to the collecting the apportionment to the Macon District, of $5000 per annum (for the next four years,) which the Georgia Conference pledged itself to raise for the Publishing-House. During my third round of quarterly meetings, embracing the Camp-meeting season, I am making private application for tens and fives, till I get the amount due from each Circuit and Station. Macon, Putnam and Perry have responded promptly—but only to state the case, and the sum needed is forthcoming. The Macon District will raise its part of the Five Thousand; and I am persuaded that a like effort will bring up the assessment from each District. The sum due from each District, is just half the sum assessed by the Financial Board, for the "Conference Collection;" the amount they seek to collect is $10,000, the $5000; so you have only to have their assessment from your District, and you have your part of the $5000 to be raised. Divide this sum among the Circuits and Stations of your District, making the apportionment of your claim by the District Stewards, the rule of action, and you will find it an easy matter to get the amount. Let us see to it brother Presiding Elders, that the pledge of the Georgia Conference is redeemed.

Macon, Georgia, August 10, 1859. JAS. E. EVANS.

CATALOGUE OF RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE.

The Course of Study in this College has been revised, and the University system adopted. Every student is free to attend the School, he or his proper guardian may choose, and to graduate in one or all of the Schools on examination, without reference to the time he has attended. He is expected, however, to take "three Tickets." The Schools are, I. Ancient Languages; II. Mathematics and Astronomy; III. Chemistry and Natural Philosophy; IV. Moral Philosophy; V. Modern Languages. The degrees are, 1. That of Proficient in Special Departments; 2. Graduate in the School of Bachelor of Arts; 4. Master of arts. The degree of A. B. is conferred on graduates in the four first-named Schools; and the degree of A. M. on those who have gained in addition three tickets of Proficiency, of which there are seven provided for. The Catalogue shows the number of pupils the past year to have been 119 in College and 22 in the Preparatory Department. The Faculty is: Rev. W. A. Smith, D. D., President and Chaplain; W. B. Carr, A. M., Prof. of An. Languages; Ro. T. Massie, Esq., Prof. of Mathematics and Astronomy; B. Puryear, A. M. Prof. of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy; W. A. Smith, D. D., Prof. of Moral Philosophy; Prof. of Moderu Languages, (to be filled); W. A. Shepard, A. B., Assistant Prof. of Ancient Languages and Mathemntics; R. S. Isbell, A. B., Prof. of Preparatory School.

THOMAS COOPER.

Mr. Thomas Cooper, formerly the infidel lecturer, but for the last year and a half the zealous Christian evangelist and disputant, has at length joined the General Baptist community. He was baptized on Wednesday, in Leicester, by the Rev. J. H. Wicks, at seven o'clock in the morning, and afterwards in the course of the day he preached three times.

This wonderful man writes a letter to the Baptist paper this week, in which he declares that although he has united himself to one of the branches of Christ's Church, he never will be a sectarian. His first year's service (extending from June, 1858, to June 1st, 1859) has certainly been free from sectarianism.

During this year Mr. Cooper has obeyed the solicitation of any evangelical party who gave him the first invitation to a town; and has lectured 267 times, and preached 177 times; in all 444 times; besides six nights' discussion with the noted "secularist," G. J. Holyoake. Of the 177 times in had preached, 53 were for the Methodist Reformers, 38 for the Baptist, 23 for the Independents, 19 for the Wesleyan Conference, 14 for the Primitive Methodists, 5 for the Methodist New Connexion, and 1 for the Presbyterians, besides 24 times in Halls and in the open air.

A "High Day."—Last Sabbath, says the Pacific Methodist of 22d July, was a memorable day with our little flock in this city. Bishop Pierce preached. The sermon will not be forgotten by any that heard it. It was full of the eloquence of the Holy Ghost, which gave to the preacher a tongue of fire. There were tears and shouts, and the communion service which followed was an occasion of sweet and sacred enjoyment, recalling to those participating the brightest periods of their past Christian experience, and rejoicing their hearts with a rich ante-past of the heaven to come.

MUNIFICENT BEQUEST.

Rev. James M. Wharr sends us the following extract from the "Eufala Express" dated Glenville, August 19, 1859. The legacy is to a school under his charge in that place, which is under the patronage of the Alabama Conference.

"The late Maj. M. A. Browder left, by his will, the sum of $100,000, to the Glenville Collegiate and Military Institute. The interest on this large sum, is to be applied to the payment of Professors' salaries and the education of poor boys. This is, we believe, one of the largest bequeats ever made to any one institution in the country. Major Browder's name deserves to be handed down to the latest posterity, and his memory ever held dear by the poor, for whose benefit he has made this princely bequest.

Saved his Class.—When Dr. A. Clarke, removed to a new station, he made it a point to join some class, and meet in it regularly. On removing to Manchester he had a new one organized, and at the close of the first meeting he stepped forward and laid his expence on the table, saying, "thank God I am in class once more."

Elder Fisher, of San Francisco, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, says the Oregon (Salem) Statesman, delivered a discourse at the Christina Church in this place, on Sunday, to a large audience. After the discourse, a society was formed.

Professor Kohlmeyer.—This gentleman's card will be found in our advertising columns. We heartily recommend the Professor as a gentleman of great personal merit, and as a learned, able and successful teacher. As a teacher of ancient languages he has probably few if any superiors.

Southern Female College, located at Rocky Springs, Claiborne county, Mississippi, under charge of Rev. Dr. T. H. Capers, see advertisement in fifth column of this page.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

Bisteneau Circuit.—Rev. R. Parvin writes: "It may be interesting to some of your readers to hear what the Lord is doing for us on Bisteneau circuit. Since our last notice to you; we have had several protracted meetings, at which, the work of the Lord has been revived. At Kennon's Chapel we pretracted eight days: there were twenty-four professed conversions, and thirty-six joined the Church. At all the appointments but two, out of eighteen, there seem to be a revival influence. We have two new Church-houses on hand, and one large campground for camp-meetings is being arranged.

"Let me tell you about our appointment at Camptee, on Red River; we closed a pretracted meeting there last night, after holding forth three or four days and nights—the congregation was large and attentive at night. On Monday most of the business houses closed doors during the hours of worship; there are seven stores in this town.

"The Protestant preachers have been passing through Camptee for the last twenty or thirty years, and they find there a lawless class of people from the country, drinking and lying about the streets, and, some of them stagger around to the preaching place and create confusion. The preacher does not know but this is a citizen of Camptee—but he makes his visit a short one, generally. I have been in Camptee four days; visited several families; found them to be kind, affable and refined in their manners. I regretted to leave this morning, as we were told we had the largest congregation at the Protestant Church that has been there in seven years.

"As we took our leave this morning we were hailed by one of the merchants, who made us a nice present. We hope there is a better day coming for Camptee.'

Winnsboro Circuit.—Rev. T. H. McClendon writes: "On Thursday, the 11th of August, we commenced a meeting at the "Oakly Church," which lasted five days; during which time, the Lord graciously revived his work among us. Many hearts were made glad by the fertilizing showers of divine grace which were so profusely shed out upon us from time to time; encircling in its grasp a number of hitherto very careless and indifferent persons, whom were made the subjects convicting and converting grace. We, with thanksgiving to God, report twenty-two accessions, and about eight conversions.

"Thanks to Bros. Duffienworth, Frazee and Tregarthen, for their faithful service.

"The grace of God will triumph. A better state of feelings is felt in that settlement than has existed there for years before. May God keep them" in the unity of the sprit."

North Rapides Circuit.—Rev. R. T. Parish writes: "The Lord has again graciously revived us on this work. Our meeting at Pallestine commenced on Saturday, 20th, and lasted five days, thirteen souls found peace in believing, seventeen accessions—sixteen whites and one black. The membership was greatly revived. This was the deepest work I have witnessed in some time. A couple of Baptists who were present, shouted aloud for joy, and one of them threw her lot amongst us.

"Rev. W. D. Stayton was with us, and labored with his usual zeal. The local Brethren were at their posts and rendered efficient service, may the Lord continue his work. To him be all the glory."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Attala Circuit.—Rev. L. Ebcanbrack writes: "Wncloscd our camp-meeting at Spring Ridge yesterday morning. Throughout, the attendance was large, and the very best of order prevailed. The tent-holders (though some of them were sick, or had several of their families sick) made all their numerous guests feel comfortable and at home. Indeed I have never seen more unbounded hospitality. Rnt, best of all, God was with us. The ministry preached in demonstration of the Spirit; and glorious were the results. "On Monday night, as Bro. Walton was explaining the history of "The rich man and Lazarus, an awful solemnity rested upon thn whole congregation. He described the sinner's course, and its fearful results in this world. It (besides many other things) murdered fathers and mothers and dear friends; and, finally, it would murder his own soul in hell. 'I,' in my imagination, (he said) see your mother, that is dead and gone to glory, looking over the battlements of heaven and saying, do your best, Walton—warn my son—my daughters! The effect was overwhelming; and when mourners were called, they ran and jumped into the altar, and for awhile nothing could be heard but the cry of the penitent, and the weeping, rejoicings of Christians. Eleven were converted before thn meeting closed that night—one Primitive Baptist, whose daughter was converted and joined the Church that night, said, I would have ridden fifty miles to have heard that sermon.

"The exact results I cannot give—but think it safe to say—conversions and reclamations, 30; sanctifications, 6 to 8; accessions, 21."

Our Elder, Bro. Wade, and Brea. Forde, Massy, Stonn, Harrle, Carlisle, Walton, Dickinson, and Word, labored faithfully' May God reward them abundntely, herenfter.

Yazoo Station.—Rev. R. W. Lambuth writes: "Permit me to write you again in reference to our meeting, which closed on the 7th of August. Thn interest was still on the increase up to the time of closing. Brother Featherston came in, and preached twice for me. Not being ahle to obtain ministerial aid, I was compelled to close—with fourteen accessions and eleven converts; many backsliders reclaimed; the Church greatly revived.

"On the 11th, I started to the Warren camp-meeting, and arrived there at night—where I spent five days very pleasantly and happily. Never did I enjoy more of the fullness of the love of God in any time of my life before. Never before havn witnessed a more general outpouring of God's spirit upon His worshipers. To the credit of all, I will say, I havn never before attended a camp-meeting where there was such perfect order.

"Wa will commence another protracted meeting here on Friday before the 1st Sabbath in September. Will thn brethren of the Mississippi Conference, who feel an interest in the welfare of Christ's Church, especially in Yazoo city, please manifest their love for us by lending their aid upon this occasion."

RELIGIOUS AND ECCLESIASTICAL.

Interesting from Turkey—An entire Turkish Tribe received into the Greek Church.

The following items of religious intelligence are taken from the Turkish correspondence of the New Evangelist Church Gazette, of Berlin: Events of great importance have recently taken place in the Eastern part of Asia Minor, among the tribe of the Koomuloo, living in the Pashalic of Trebizonde, and called after Koorum, a place situated on the Black Sea. This tribe counts about 3,000 families, 6,000 members of which have settled in the town of Trebizonde as portera. The national and linguistic peculiarities have not yet been sufficiently investigated; but European travelers had discovered long ago that though apparently Mohammedans since thn destruction of the empire of Trebizonde, (in 1461,) they did not circumcise their children, had secretly priests, and celebrated by night Christian services in ruined Churches. Since the restoration of a Russian consulship at Trebizonde, many of these poor people threw off obedience to the Turkish Government, betaking themselves for a short time, with the support of the Russian consulship, to the territory of Russia, and after having provided themselves with Russian passports returned to their homes. Desiring probably more to put a stop to this practice than to execute one of the promises of the Hatti-Houmayun, the Turkish Government proclaimed, in March of the current year, a firman for the Pashalics of Trebizonde and Erzeroum, which gives permission to the Koorumloo to return to the faith of their ancestors, on the condition, however, that also as Christians they would have to do military service, which was formerly demanded of Mohammedans only. In consequence of this proclamation about 7,000 Koorumloo have declared themselves before the Turkish authorities as Christians. Many, however, still exert themselves to make themselves free from military service, which gives rise to many conflicts between the Pasha of Trebizonde and the Russian consul."

The Broad Church of Dr. Bellows.

The Evening Post says the Rev. Dr. Bellows has on, undertaking an progress which, if successful, will place his name upon the roll of religious fame. It is no less than to found a new Catholic Church, differing from the Church which acknowledges Archbishop Hughes as its Metropolitan head, by the omission of what may be deemed certain obsolete, erroneous or needless doctrines, but preserving the attractive features, the rituals, the imaginative symbols, the sacred festivals, which help to give the Roman Catholic Church its popular and universal character. The name of the proposed organization is the Broad Church. In this magnificent scheme, we understood that Dr. Bellows enjoys the co-operation of Dr. Osgood and the Rev. Mr. Frothingham, the other Unitarian clergyman of this city. He will also have a seminary to propagate the new evangel in Antioch College, a flourishing institution at the West, of which he has been a most efficient friend.

Dr. Osgood is reported to have prepared a liturgy to be submitted to the consideration of American Unitarians, who, with one or two other sects, would form the nucleus of the new denomination. Dr. Bellows maintains that modern Protestantism is merely negative, barren and behind the times; and, in short, is, to some extent, a failure. "Historical Unitarianism," says he, "is fast becoming a local peculiarity, a Boston notion." This assertion, it is affirmed, is sustained by figures and statistics, relating to the history of the sect. Hence the project of a "broad Church," and a return to the rights and ceremonial heretofore discarded by a majority of modern Protestants.—Spectator.

Great Methodist Camp Meeting.

A Boston dispatch, of Sunday, 14th instant, says: The great annual Wesleyan Camp-Meeting at the Vineyard was attended to-day by about 20,000 persons. Impressive discourses were delivered by different clergymen. The weather was delightful, and perfect order was maintained throughout the day.

TO CHRISTIANS OF ALL DENOMINATIONS.

Prayer for the Unity of the Spirit.

Dear Brethren: The thoughtful reader or our Lord's intercessory prayer must mark with deep interest, the earnestness with which He prays for oneness among His disciples.

No less than four times, in that prayer (John xvii.) does our blessed Lord offer the request (each slightly varying in phraseology) "that they all may be one," showing how near to His holy heart was this unity among his followers.

The Apostles St. Paul, guided by the Holy Ghost, presses upon the Christians at Rome, (xii. 5,) Corinth, (i. 10; xii 12, of 1st Epistle,) Galatia, (iii. 28,) Ephesus, (iv. 3, 6,) Philippi (ii. 2,) and Colosse (iii. 11, 14,) this same unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.

Assured that all believers in Christ heartily desire that His prayer may be answered, and the Apostle's injunctions obeyed; and that those needless divisions among Christians, which are so opposed to the Divine Will, and which so obstruct the progress of the pure gospel, may be done away, the undersigned respectfully suggest that one day be annually set apart for special prayer, that God would grant that his believing children "may be made perfect in one," and that by the operation of the Holy Ghost, all Christians may be so joined together in unity of spirit and in the bond of peace, that they may be an holy temple acceptable to Him.

Thus humbly approaching the throne of grace, united in heart, with a request so consonent to the expressed will of God, we may believe, that the Great Head of the Church in answering prayer for increased unity of the spirit, will Himself lead that Church into such measures for the accomplishment of outward union as shall most redound to His Glory.

We beg leave to designate the first Monday of October, as the day for such special prayer, and invite our Christian Brethren generally to unite in these solemn applications.

THE GERMANIC CONFEDERATION.

The members of the Chamber of Deputies have already held a preparatory meeting, and it is said that they are all agreed that a reform of the German Federal Constitution is desirable. That question will form the basis of the address which will be presented to the King. A meeting of men of the liberal party from all parts of Germany has been held at Eisenach. The following resolutions were agreed to:

1. We see in the present condition of affairs great dangers to the independence of our German fatherland, and these dangers have been increased, rather than diminished, by the peace just concluded between France and Austria.

2. These dangers have their ultimate cause in the faults of the Federal Constitution of Germany, and they can only be averted by a speedy modification of that constitution.

3. With that object, it is necessary that the Germanic Diet should be replaced by a central government of Germany, firm, strong, and permanent, and that a National Assembly shall be convoked.

4. Under present circumstances, the proper steps for attaining that object can only emanate from Prussia, and it is therefore necessary to use every effort to induce Prussia to take the initiative.

5. With that object, and to preserve more effectually the foreign interests of Germany, it is expedient provisionally, and until the definite constitution of the central German Government, to confer on Prussia the direction of the German military forces, and the diplomatic representation of Germany abroad.

6. It is the duty of every German to support with all his might the Prussian Government, as far as it tends to this object, and assuredly the German people will not shrink from any sacrifice required by the independence, unity and happiness of the German fatherland.

COMMERCIAL.

Monday Evening, August 29, 1859.

The following statement is condensed from the weekly report of the New Orleans Price-Current, ending on tha 27th instant:

Our market generally has presented very little animation during the week, as there is very little doing in our leading export staples, while the various articles of Western Produce are only taken in limited parcels for home consumption.

On Friday the steamer America's advices came to hand with Liverpool dates to 13th inst. reporting the week's sales of Cotton at 42,000 bales, the market closing dull at a decline of 1-16 to 1d. per pound in the Middling and lower grades. The quotations given were 8¼ for Fair Orleans and 7¾d for Middling. The total stock at Liverpool was stated at 633,000 bales, of which, 577,000 bales were American. The Manchester advices were of a favorable character, the prices for goods and yarns being firmly maintained.

COTON.—With only a limited portion of the old crop suited to tha damand, and but modarete arrivals of the new, the scope for operations has been very much circumscribed, and the week's sales sum up barley 3,400 bales; received since 1st September, (exclusive of those from Mobile, Florida and Texas) 1,669,015 bales, against 1,560,000 bales, to same duta last year. The total exports of the week amount to 5,122 bales; the stock in presses and on shipboard, not cleared on the 26th inst., 27,757 bales. The sales of old crop have been made at about the range of our quotations, which are slightly reduced for the lower grades, and the week's business embraces about 2,350 bales new crop, at an extreme range of 11 to 12½c. Middling to Good Middling being 12 to 12¼c. per pound. The week closes dull, as buyers appear disposed to wait an accumulation of new crop, which begins to arrive more freely, in the expectation of obtaining some advantage in prices.

The week's receipts embrace 4581 bales new crop, against 2220 bales in the corresponding week last year, and the total receipts of new crop to date are 6841 bales against 3000 bales to the same dntn last year.

The recent receipts show a marked falling off in quality; a considerable portion classing down as low as Low Middling, having much leaf, and some dust and stain; indicating exposure to heavy rains.

New Orleans Classification:

Inferior	6 @ 7	Good Middling	12¼@12½
Ordinary	8 @ 9	Middling Fair	12¾@—
Good Ordinary	10 @10¼	Fair	—@—
Low Middling	10¾@11	Good Fair	—@—
Middling	11⅛@11⅝	Good and Fine	—@—

SUGAR.—The sales of the week amount to 500 hhds. Waquoin for Inferior and Refining 4 to 5; Common to Good Common 5¼ to 6; Fair to Fully Fair 6¼ to 6¾; Prime to Choice 7 to 7¼; Centrifugal and Clarified — to —; Refined — to — cents per pound.

MOLASSES.—The sales of thn week are about 250 hhds. The quotations are: For Inferior and Fermenting 30 to 34; Prime to Choice and Rebolled 38 to 38 in hhds.; Fifty-refinery rebolled 38 to 40 cents per gallon.

TOBACCO.—Is quoted for Lugs—factory, — to —; plasters 3½ to 4½; fine leaf, selection to common 5½ to 7½; and fine to fine 7½ to 8¾; choice, heavy and light, 8¾ to 9¾ and 10 cents per pound.

FLOUR.—The sales have amounted to about 4000 bbls. The market continues its heavy and inactive appearance. We quote a range, from $4 50 to $4 75 for ordinary to superfine, $4 90 to $5 00 for good superfine, $5 00 to $5 25 for ordinary to good extra, and $6 00 to $7 00 and $7 50 per bbl. for choice extra brands.

GRAIN.—The sales of Corn during the week smount to about 8,000 sacks—the extreme figures of the sales ranging from 75 to 80c. for inferior and ordinary mixed 82½ to 86c. for good mixed, 90 to 92½ for fair to prime yellow, and 90 to $1 00 for ordinary to good and prime white. Oats sell at 46 to 50c. for ordinary to prime, some choice black St. Louis at 55 cents per bushel. Brsn is quoted at $1 00 to $1 20 per 100 lbs. Wheat, we quote 75c. to 10c. per bushel for ordinary red to good red.

PORK.—The demand this week has been of a very limited character. We quote Mess at $14 25 to $14 50 per barrel—dealers realize $15 00 to $15 25.

BACON.—Shoulders 7½ to 7¾; Ribbed Sides 10 to 10¼; Clear Sides 11¼ to 11¾; Sugar-cured Hams 12 to 13½ cents per pound. Purchases have mostly been made from second hands.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY.

So. Methodist Publishing-house, Nashville,
May 30, 1859.

We intend, as heretofore, to keep a full supply of Books of our own publication at the Agency of the Southern Methodist Publishing-house, at New Orleans. J. B. McFerrin, Agent.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the New Orleans Depository, will please direct to Keenen & Parker.

NOTICE.

Brethren of the Conference: We have on hand, at the Depository in Mobile, a good supply of our publications, both of the General Catalogue and of our Sunday-school and Tract issues, which we are anxious to sell. Are you doing for this cause all you might and should? Are your people supplied with books? Would it not improve their piety and advance the interests of the cause of Christ generally, for them to read more? Would it not contribute much to improve and give permanency to the religious character of your young converts, to have them supplied with proper reading? I think, just here is one of our errors. Let us reform and instruct our young people in the doctrine and experience of religion, and thus develop a higher standard of Christian character.

Send on your orders to Bro. J. F. Early, he will be glad to fill them. And, as a brethier has recently donated a hundred dollars for that purpose, I authorize you to order a few dollars' worth, each, for gratuitous distribution among the poor and ignorant. I expect to receive more donations of the same kind.

J. Hamilton.

☞ I would suggest to all the official members, that it is important that they should be in attendance at the Quarterly Meetings, as there will be interesting business before all the Conferences that must be promptly attended to, in view of the future welfare of the Church. Come, brethren, let us have the benefit of your presence and counsel. A. B. Fly.

Camp-Meeting.—There will be a Self-supporting Camp-meeting on Lake Bisteneau Circuit, commencing 23d September, 1859, at Bethel Church, Prior's Settlement, 20 miles north of Campte, near the Military Road. A general invitation is extended. R. Parvin.

Notice.—There will be a Camp Meeting at Old Bethel camp ground, commencing Wednesday, 28st September, Wilkinson county, Mississippi.

Also, on Wednesday, 5th October, a Camp-Meeting will be held at Otapaan camp-ground, Pike county Mississippi.

August 18, 1859. L. Campbell, P. E.

Adams Camp-Meeting.—Amite Mississippi, Amite Circuit, will commence on Friday, before the third Sunday in October. All who live near the camp-ground are respectfully invited to camp—and aid, in every way possible, to sustain visitors who come from a distance. Let no tent be crowded.

E. R. Strickland.

The Camp-Meeting, near Macon Mississippi, will commence on Friday before the First Sabbath in September.

THE HOME CIRCLE FOR 1860.

Important Announcement.

Determined to place the Home Circle in such a position that it shall stand without a rival in its line, and command the suffrages of every member of the M. E. Church, South, the Publisher takes this method of announcing that it will be issued January 1st, 1860, with several entirely new and attractive features.

The magazine will contain, as heretofore, 64 pp., royal octavo, and will be printed in the very first style, upon fine paper, with a new and elegant engraved cover; but it is intended, by liberal expenditure and judicious arrangements, to make it far more worthy of patronage than ever before.

Foremost among the attractions to be presented will be an original series of Portraits of Distinguished Members of the M. E. Church, South, both male and female, embracing representatives from every Conference in the Connection, engraved expressly for the purpose. In addition to this, each number will be embellished with a steel-plate engraving, constituting a series which it is intended shall embrace eventually all the principal points of beauty or interest in the Southern States, and comprising Mountains and Valleys, Hills and Dales, Lakes, Rivers and Cataracts, Town and Country Public Buildings, Schools and Colleges, Churches and Private Villas; the whole constituting an entirely unique feature in works of this class, and presenting a claim upon the patronage of the members of the M. E. Church, South, and upon all lovers of the beautiful, such as has never before been offered.

It is needless to say that the execution of this design involves a very heavy outlay of money, amounting to thousands of dollars; but, believing that a vastly enlarged subscription-list will amply reward the enterprise, and resolved to merit that increase, the Publisher has determined upon adding still another and important feature to those already named: consequently, besides the above, every number will contain two magnificent Woodcut Illustrations of incidents in the life of the great Reformer, Martin Luther, engraved in the very highest style of the art. These engravings (fifty in number) will be accompanied by four pages of descriptive letter-press, printed in beautiful style; the whole constituting a series which will run through twenty-six consecutive numbers. These pages will be printed so as to fold by themselves, and may be separated from the rest of the number and bound together; and thus, at the expiration of the series, each subscriber will be possessed, without cost, of one of the most elegant volumes, ever published, "The Life of Martin Luther, in fifty pictures."

But the Publisher, well aware that pictorial illustration constitutes only a portion of the claims of any magazine to favor and support, has made ample arrangements to enhance the interest and value of the Literary Department. The Editor, the Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D., will continue to spread his monthly "feast of fat things" for the delectation of his readers; and his energies will kindle, and his pen sparkle, in proportion to the number of kindly faces he finds around his editorial table. The assistants, too, of a numerous Corps of Gifted Contributors has been secured.

Great as are the improvements thus announced, and the additional expense involved, the Publisher wishes it distinctly understood that he does not intend to relax in his efforts still further to improve and embellish the magazine, and to make it what it ought to be—and must be—the best magazine of its class in the United States.

It is in contemplation to add, at an distant day, a Musical Department, under the supervision of an eminent Professor of Music; and as an enlarged subscription-list shall justify, still other important additions, useful and ornamental, will be made to the present list of claims upon patronage.

TERMS.—The subscription-price will remain as heretofore, $2,00 per annum, strictly in advance, to pay funds.

All orders for the Home Circle, and all letters on business, must be addressed to J. B. M'Ferrin, Agent, Nashville, Tenn.

Communications having reference to the Literary Department will be addressed to the Rev. L. D. Huston, D. D. Nashville, Tennessee.

INDUCEMENTS TO AGENTS.

Every traveling preacher or other agent is entitled to retain 20 per cent. (40 cents) on each subscription forwarded in per funds to the Publisher. In addition to this liberal discount, every agent forwarding the money for Twenty Subscribers, or upwards, shall receive, at the end of thn year, free per mail, a copy of the Home Circle, handsomely bound.

☞ Agents should be early in the field, and subscriptions should be sent in as soon as possible, that all damnds may be promptly met.

THE "ARTISAN."—OUR READERS WILL be gratified to learn that this very excellent journal of American and English Patents, Science, Art, Discovery, Inventions, etc. etc. published by the American Patent Company, at Cincinnati, Ohio, is now the cheapest scientific and mechanical paper in the world. The Company having an immense capital of $100 000, have recently resolved to place the terms of the American so low that everybody can subscribe for it. We advise all our readers to send for a specimen copy, and determine for themselves, whether it is not well worth $1 50 for fifty two papers. It is fully up with the times in Illustrations, scientific and mechanical information. The Company is a regularly incorporated institution, and comprises in its Directory some of the leading men of Cincinnati. It is largely engaged in selling as well as soliciting Patents. SOUTHERN FEMALE COLLEGE.—THE Fourth Scholastic Year of this Institution will commence on Wednesday, the 14th ensuing next, under the management and control of Rev. Dr. T. H. Capers, President, assisted by Rev. Dr. B. H. Carroll as associate, who was formerly Professor of Ancient Languages in Franklin College. His long established character as a teacher, is too well known to require commendation. These gentlemen will bring into the College—and will have here by the opening of the Session—as able a Faculty as can be found in any institution in our country. It is useless for us to say, for the fact is already established, that President Capers will have thorough scholarship in all the departments.

The Music Department will be under the supervision of Prof. Carlos G. Bulwer, M.D., who brings the highest testimonials of capacity and moral worth. These testimonials are from our own State, and from those who are personally known to the Trustees and Faculty.

Our Institution is in a high, healthy section of the State, remote from any town and from the great thoroughfares of the country, and offers to its pupils the advantages of retirement and healthful exercise in the open air. The society in the vicinity of the College is as good as can be found in any portion of the State. We offer, as an inducement for parents to send their children to this Institution, the fact, that the President is a regular physician, of age and experience—and, from extensive practice in former years is familiar with the diseases of this climate and their treatment. It is a rule of the Institution, that no charge shall be made for Medical services rendered the pupils.

Parents bringing their children by way of the river, will land at Grand Gulf, and go out by railroad to Port Gibson, where arrangements have been made with the livery-stables to bring them out to the College without delay.

All communications addressed to the President, at Rocky Springs, Claiborne county, Mississippi—will meet with prompt attention.

THE NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Children's Column.

"Suffer the Little Children to come unto Me."

For the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Milan, and Ada.

Died at Oak Hill, St. Helena Parish, Louisiana, on the 19th July, Nina Morris. And on the 6th of August, 1859, Ida Lee, daughter of R. M. and Mary J. Ellis—the former, eight years five months and one day; the latter, seven months and fourteen days.

Dear Sir:—I feel it my duty to give to the world, through the medium of your valuable paper, a brief outline of the lives, characters and death of these sweet children, in the hope, that some little child or children may read it and be constrained to copy their examples, that their death may be like theirs; and, thereby, though dead, they may yet speak to the rising generation.

Ada, although so young, for a year before her death, would never go to bed until after the had said her sweet little prayer:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

She would kiss papa and mamma, her sisters and brothers, wishing each a good night's rest. At table she would always put up both hands, when the blessing was asked, and oft times peep through her little fingers to see if all the family copied her example; and if she discovered that any had failed to do so, she would chide them saying, "you did'nt put up both hands." Thus she had commenced a Christian life; and, although permitted to remain with us so short a time, that little span is fraught with ten thousand of the most precious memories.

The last illness was of the most distressing character, being putrid sore throat, she died of suffocation; but as long as she could catch a breath long enough to speak, she would say to me, "mamma, sing to me, and rock me to sleep."

When her little heart, the songs of Zion charmed her feet on earth, and the harps of Angels greeted her first in heaven.

How shall I speak of our dear little Ida Lee, or Tom, as she was familiarly called? Were I to delineate all the minutia of her character and disposition, you would marry with its very sweetness; she was a personification of all the Christian graces; exemplifying them in all their loveliness in her, daily walk and conversation; kind and gentle to all, from father and mother, brother and sister, down to the humblest insect. She not only prayed, but, like her little sister Mary Evelyn or Pet Lamb (who has been a resident of heaven now for six years;) she knew how to pray; she always found relief at the foot-stool of mercy, prayer was her solace in life and her comfort in the solemn hour and article of death. Two days before her angelic spirit left the emaciated little tenement which confined it here, her mother was lying on the bed beside her, gently fanning her fevered brow; she slept for a few moments, and waking, looked in her face with an exultated expression of countenance, and said, "mamma, I had a singular dream." What was it my darling? "I can't tell you, 'ma." Why my babe? "I am afraid it will make you feel bad." Did you dream mamma was dead? "No ma'am." Did you dream papa was dead? "No, ma'am." Well, did you dream about Nina? "Yes, ma'am." What was it, precious? Let me hear it. "Well, I'll tell you, I thought I went to heaven; and, Oh, I saw so many angels; and Nina came running to meet me; and she had a beautiful wreath in one hand, and a sweet little harp in the other; she put the wreath on my head, and the harp in my hand—and she told me to look at her little brother—sitting close by the Saviour's side." I then asked her, if she saw Pet Lamb and Grand-mamma? She told me she did.

O! blessed religion! that can fill the minds of dying infants with such visions as these. To have one such in death, is worth wading through a life-time of sorrow.

During the last three days of her life she kept me almost constantly singing hymns of her own selection, and would often try to join in the chorus—particularly of one, which was a favorite:

"O! what a happy day when the Christians meet above
They'll meet to part no more."

When we found that she was grappling with the monster, Death, I asked her if she was afraid to die? she answered, "no, ma'am." Are you happy, my darling? "Yes, ma'am."

"Happy day, when Jesus washed my sins away."

Now, mamma, sing 'Plant ye a tree.'" She knew the rest of the verse, but her respiration was so difficult she could not repeat it.

Methinks, I can almost see my four little ones, with Christian—with their palms of victory, crowns of glory, and harps of golden strings chanting the praises of Him who washed them, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

Were my labors at an end, and my Saviour satisfied with my stewardship, O! how happy would I be to join them in that "sun-bright clime" where

"Sickness, and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more."

The Pilgrimage Monument.

In the year 1608 a few English farmers with their families left their old home at Scrooby in Nottinghamshire, left the pleasant shores of the Trent, the romantic traditions of Sherwood forest, the horizon of familiar splendor, blooming hedgerows of hawthorn and privet, the lovely English landscape and the dear English land, and went through dangers and difficulties to Amsterdam.

A few months later they removed to Leyden. There for a dozen years they lived, never more than three hundred men and women, honest, patient, sober, industrious, poor, and forgotten. They were only a handful of English farmers who loved an idea more than native land, more than all sweet associations of home and kindred, more than life itself.

But they were English still, and loved England. Was there no way in which they could serve their idea and still serve England? At least they could try. After much pilgrim and council and meditation, after many arrangements and doubts and fears, a few of the farmers and their descendants left "that goodly and pleasant city;" they left the clean, wide streets of thrifty Leyden, the quiet canals, the friendly wind-mills which the children know, the venerable shade of the old University, and came to Delft Haven, fourteen miles away, upon the River Maese. There they knelt upon the shore, and wept and prayed. There they sang hymns, and listened to their pastor, who told them that he was "very confident the Lord had more truth and light yet to break forth out of His Holy Word; and that it was "not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick Anti-christian darkness, and that full perfection of knowledge should break forth at once;" and so with the solemn music ringing in their ears, and the wise words of their teacher thrilling their hearts, on the 22d of July, 1620—which, with the difference of styles, is almost 230 years ago on the 1st August of this year—they sailed in the little Speedwell, of sixty tons burden. Nothing more is known, says their old historian, that "they were ..... "and looked not much on those things, but lift up their eyes to the heavens, their dearest country, and quieted their spirits."

Speedwell was leaky, and was left behind, while the Mayflower the ninety emigrants sailed, and landed on the coast of Massachusetts, going permanently ashore at Plymouth.

Their descendants meet this week to lay the cornerstone of a monument to commemorate the beginning of their history and the brave lives of their forefathers. And, indeed, without a monument they are not likely to forget them. The sons of the Pilgrims are fond of reminding the rest of the world of the fact. Is it any wonder? Was there ever a colony planted upon a foreign shore under circumstances so sublime? No Greek or Roman, no French or English settlement had a higher object than conquest, discovery, greater facility of trade, or individual case. In this case, for trade, the pilgrims hoped to make a living; for ease, they embraced discomfort and death; for conquest, a handful encountered a savage race; for discovery, the land was already known.

They do well to build a monument. They do well to meet year, by year, and repeat that stern old story. They do well in every way to commemorate the settlement of their country. And yet how justly may it not be said to every son and daughter of the Pilgrims in New England, as to Michael Angelo in St. Peter's, as to Wren in St. Paul's "Si monumentum quæris, circumspice!"

The Family Circle.

"Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

NAPOLEON'S LOVE LETTERS.

Napoleon, amid scenes of carnage, could abstract himself from the horrors around him, and sit down and pen those tender, playful epistles to Josephine, which excite our smiles and makes us forget the soldier in the husband. No sooner is the battle lost and won, and the shout of victory raised, than a missive of congratulation, void of all the pomp and circumstances of war, is dispatched to the dear ones at home, without whose sympathy the hardest won victory would be barren. Napoleon greets Josephine from Marmirolo, and—sends a kiss to his wife's lap-dog. Nelson batters Copenhagen, and—composes verses to Emma, his "Guardian Angel." Herein Love, the great leveller, places the drummer-boy on a par with his general, and the forecastle Jack on a footing with his admiral.

The letters subjoined are selected from a numerous correspondence that passed between Napoleon and Josephine, when he was engaged in his campaign in Italy, in 1798. Amid the perils of war he could find time to pen only the briefest expressions of his ardent love for Josephine. The letters given below are among the longest in the series. It is a matter of regret that none of her letters were preserved. They were probably destroyed as soon as read.

The first letter is from Napoleon to Josephine, when she was at Milan. It is dated Marmirolo, July, 1796.

"I have received your letter, my dearest love; it has filled my heart with joy. I am greatly obliged to you for the trouble you have taken to send me all the news; your health is doubtless better now. I feel sure you are getting quite well. Let me strongly recommend you to take exercise on horseback."

"I have been dull ever since we parted. I am happy only when with you. I never cease thinking of your kisses, of your tears, and your amusing little jealousies; the charms of the matchless Josephine ever keep my heart and feelings warm. When free from care or business, what happiness to pass every moment with you, to love only you, to tell it and to prove it to you! I shall send you your horse. But I hope you will soon rejoin me. I believe I have always loved you, but I think I love you a thousand times better now than ever. This proves that La Bruyere's maxim, l'amour vient tout d'un coup, is false. Everything in nature grows and increases. Ah! I beg of you to let me see some of your defects; be less beautiful, less kind, less good; but especially, never be jealous, never weep; your tears distract me, set my blood on fire. Believe me, I have not a thought except for you, or that you might not know.

Take repose. Reestablish your health quickly. Come to me, and at least, before we die, let us say we had some days of happiness.

A thousand kisses, the same to Fortune, (Josephine's lap-dog,) in spite of her naughtiness. BONAPARTE."

Josephine is still at Milan, but Napoleon's headquarters are removed to Brescia. This letter is dated August 10th:

"I have arrived at this place, my dearest love, and my first thought is of writing to you. Your health and your image have occupied all my thoughts on my way hither. I shall not be at ease until I receive letters from you. I expect them with the greatest eagerness. It is impossible to describe to you my impatience. I feel dull, sad and half sick. If the deepest and tenderest love can make you happy, you ought to be so. I am overwhelmed with business."

"Adieu, my dear Josephine—love me, take care of yourself and think often, very often, of me.

BONAPARTE."

Napoleon is now at Verona, and his letter bears date Sept. 17th:

"I write very often to you, my dear love, but very seldom hear from you. You are a fickle, ugly, wicked creature. Perfidious! to deceive a poor husband and ardent lover! Must he forfeit his rights because he is far away, burdened with difficulties, cares and fatigue! Without his Josephine, without the assurance of her love, what remains for him on earth? What can he do?

* * * * * * * *

Arrived at Modena, he writes under date October 17th, and playfully reproaches her with not responding to his ardor:

"The day before yesterday I was all day in the field. Yesterday I kept my bed. I have a headache and fever, but that does not prevent me writing to my dearest love. I have received your letters and pressed them to my lips and heart, and the palms of absence and a hundred miles of distance have vanished. At this moment I fancy I see you, not capricious, nor cross, but kind and gentle, with that unction of goodness which is the exclusive gift of my Josephine. But it was only a dream, and you may judge from it that my fever has not left me. Your letters are as cold as if you were fifty; they are like fifteen years after marriage; they exhibit the friendship and feelings of the winter of life. Tye! Josephine! This is very wrong, very wicked, very treacherous of you. Why do you give me so much cause to complain? Do you no longer love me? Eh! is that the fact? Do you hate me? Well, I suspect so.

"A thousand, thousand kisses, as tender as my heart.

"I am better; I start to-morrow. The English quit the Mediterranean. Corsica is ours. Good news for France and for the army. NAPOLEON."

He is at Verona again on the 13th November, pleasing himself with the thought of giving Josephine a million burning kisses:

"I don't love you a bit; on the contrary, I detest you. You are an ugly, stupid, wicked hussy. You never write to me, and you do not love your husband. You know the delight your letters afford me, and yet you send me only half a dozen horrid lines.

"Pray, madame, what do you do with yourself all day? What important business is it that prevents your writing to your fond lover? What affection stifles and puts aside the love, the tender and constant love you promised me? Who can this new wonder be, this new lover, that absorbs all your time, tyrannizes over your days, and prevents you from thinking of your husband? Take care, Josephine, some fine night, the doors closed, I'll surprise you.

"But seriously, I am very uneasy, my dear love, at receiving no news from you; write me four pages immediately, full of those charming things that fill my heart with tenderness and delight.

"I hope to embrace you before long; then I shall cover you with a million burning kisses. BONAPARTE."

CREOSOTE FOR FOOT-EVIL.

MR. EDITOR: I have been experimenting with creosote and I find that it speedily arrests and cures foot-evil, which has been so prevalent this year among our horses and cattle. It should be applied to the diseased part after being well cleansed with a feather. It blisters the part almost immediately, and the ox or horse gets well in a few days.

Perhaps the above may benefit your numerous readers; if you can spare a place for it in your valuable paper. P. A.

Obituaries:

"Let me die the death of the Righteous."

MRS. AMANDA DYSON, wife of Aquila Dyson, died of measles, at her residence in this Parish, on Monday 6th of June, 1859. She was born on Big Creek, in this parish (then Ouachita parish), on 18th December 1828; was the daughter of Dr. Prior L. and Mary S. Gwin. In her eighth year she was bereft of her excellent mother, and in the following year her father also was snatched away, leaving her in orphanage. She found a home with her grandfather, James Gwin, Esq., by whom she was raised. She became a member of the M. E. Church, in her eighteenth year, and soon after professed faith in Christ. From her infancy she was noted for her exemplary piety, and her upright demeanor won the love of all who knew her. On 31st of July, 1845, she was married to Mr. Aquila Dyson, to whom she proved a most affectionate wife. Want and distress, could never go by her unheeded; she was truly a mother to the orphan, having taken under her care and protection, at different times, since her marriage, a number of destitute orphan children, who loved her with filial tenderness. Her house was a home for the weary minister of the gospel. For several days previous to her death she was aware of its approach; and called to her friends to be of good cheer; expressed the fullest confidence in the realization of a christian's brightest hope, and requested them to meet her in heaven. Her family and other relations, she called separately, and after giving each her kind admonitions, bade them farewell, with the solemn injunction, "dont forget to pray." She has left to mourn an affectionate husband, two lovely children, a beloved and only sister, a aged grandfather besides many relatives and friends. The little orphans, too, who received from her a mother's care, will feel for her a mother's loss.

M. DAVIS P. C.

MRS. MARY SAVOY died in her seventy-third year, having lived to see children, grand-children, and great grand-children—in all between ninety and one hundred—sixty of whom still live. She had been married twice—her first husband was a Fortener. She had been for many years a consistent and useful member of the M. E. Church. And such had been her life and spirit, up to the day of her death, as a Christian, that it was said the day I preached her funeral and placed her remains in the cold ground, that, "If Mother Savoy has not gone to heaven, I see no use for any one to try to get there. Weep not ye children and friends! Mother Mary Savoy is in heaven. Sweet heaven! O, when shall I get there? At the same time, I also preached the funeral of little Lewis Fortener, a grand-child of Mother Savoy. Lewis was only ten months old, and the son of Martin Fortener. Rest, sweet boy, with thy aged grandmother "until the heavens be no more;" then come forth to a glorious immortality. P. E. GREEN.

Warren county, August 16, 1859.

MRS. CAROLINE C. VAUGHN, wife of Manoah V. Vaughn, aged twenty-five years, died in Jackson, parish, Louisiana, July 21. She had been a member of the M. E. Church for ten years. She moved from Mississippi to this parish about two years ago. She endeared herself to this community by her many good qualities of heart. As a wife and mother she had few equals. As a Christian, she was "a burning and shining light." Her troubles are now over, she can never return to us.

The Latest and the Best.

MOORE'S THIRTY-DOLLAR DOUBLE-LOCK-Stitch Family Sewing Machine.—Recently Secured by Letters Patent.

The advent of this new, most useful, and incomparable Machine, is destined to create a great and decided change in public opinion upon the subject of CHEAP SEWING MACHINES.

We confidently assert and can conclusively prove by a practical demonstration, that this Machine embraces to its construction the best combination of SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES to be found in any Sewing Machine now before the public, regardless of price! With an eye quick to detect the deficiencies and imperfections of other Machines, Mr Moore has sought to remedy them all; and we feel assured a critical examination of this beautiful piece of machinery, will at once establish it as the only real desirable cheap Machine in the country, and far preferable to any high-priced Machine now sold. It sews directly from two spools, (as bought at the store, without re-winding,) one above the Machine, and one underneath, and makes the strongest, most elastic and durable stitch, made either by hand or machinery. It cannot be ripped, though the cloth is cut entirly off every half inch. The stitch possesses the same elasticity on this as upon thick goods, thereby making it particularly applicable for articles that require washing and ironing. The machinery for feeding the cloth is entirely unlike any other, and is, without doubt the best ever constructed.

The breaking of needles, a common and expensive fault with most other Machines, is entirely remedied in this; with proper care, one needle may last for months. The entire Machine is simple in construction, and made in every respect perfect and durable. Unlike other Machines, there is no danger of damaging the article sewed by oil, as none is used on top of the Machine. It is also made large enough for every description of work, there being a clear space nine inches in length by four in height, between the needle and end of the Machine. In beauty of design and mechanical construction, it has no equal in the country; all the movements being positive, and the friction light there is not the slightest probability of its getting out of order. It stands entirely upon its own merits, and needs no better reference than its own good works to convince all who see it, that it is the most valuable and momentary invention of the age.

It is our intention to sell a small portion of the territory by States or Counties, upon an equitable and fair basis. As a safe and highly remunerative investment it has no equal. Extensive arrangements have been made for the manufacture of these Machines, and the large profit to owners of territory, command the enterprise to the attention of all who wish to make money rapidly on a small capital. We will send a sample Machine, securely boxed, by express or otherwise, to any address upon receipt of Thirty Dollars. Every Machine is warranted. Send for a descriptive circular, giving full particulars. SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.—THE Undersigned is ready to receive at his Office, at 84 Common street, the LOAN to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, recommended by the meetings of the Stockholders held on the 4th and 8th of August.

It is important that the Stockholders and others who intend to contribute to the same should act promptly.

It is not believed that an appeal to the citizens of New Orleans, who are so largely interested in the great enterprize, will be vain, when other points, having no local interests in the road, have contributed two and three times as much as is asked for in this city.

PURIFIES THE BLOOD!

B. F. WILLIAMS' COMPOUND SYRUP OF SARSAparilla, and Iodide of Potassium. This medicine is offered as one of the best preparations of Sarsaparilla extant, and as a curative remedy has won great favor at Nashville, Tenn., and other Southern Cities. The medical faculty authorize its use (having been shown the recipe.) As a BLOOD PURIFIER there is no remedy equal to this compound, and for the cure of a numerous progeny that owe their origin and parentage to a strumous Diathesis or Scrofulous taint in the Constitution and in the blood, such as White Swelling, Chronic Ulcers of long standing, Obstinate Tetter, Ring Worms, Sore Eyes, Scald Head, Syphilitic Disorders, and other diseases of the skin and blood that resist the usual treatment. He can substantiate by the very best evidence in our City, its efficacy in Nervous and General Debility, Indigestion or Dyspepsia, Inflammation of the kidneys, Rheumatism, etc, etc. It is confidently recommended in diseases peculiar to Females, such as Leucorrhœa or Whites, Suppressed Menstration, Chlorris or Green Sickness. Try it.—You will be satisfied with the result. Read what Dr. Hudson says. He is a gentleman of high standing.

Charlotte, Tenn., Sept. 16, 1859.

MR. B. F. WILLIAMS: Instances are not rare where the attending physician fails to cure wall confirmed Scrofula. The following memorandum is interesting:

SUBJECT—A girl of 16 or 18 years of age, the attending physician had failed to cure. An anxious father had consulted me, and from my knowledge of your preparation, I was constrained to prescribe it. After taking six bottles she was considered well. She was cured of a deep-seated ulcer and a constant drain of milky matter from one or more sores under the ear. The entire lymphatic system was deeply involved. This case alone is well worth the attention of all—but when added to a long catalogue of cases of great obstinacy, cured by no panacea nor Nostrum, nor Patent Medicine, no Secret, but an invaluable preparation of Sarsaparilla, Iodide of Potassa, etc., well compounded by the Chemist, and made familiar to the intelligent physician, it very justly deserves a trial by all laboring under any of the numerous chronic diseases that afflict us.

J. R HUDSON, M. D.

Oakland College, Miss., Nov. 20, 1858.

MR. J. F. MCAVOY: With regard to your inquiry about the "Williams Sarsaparilla and Iodide of Potash," which I purchased of you, I have no hesitation in affirming that it acted magically. My sister was afflicted with a cutaneous eruption, which enveloped the head and a large surface of the body, and which resisted all medical treatment. I think that one bottle affected a permanent cure, though I continued the treatment until two bottles had been used. It has been eighteen months since, and as yet there has been no re-appearance of the disease. I have frequently expressed, and reiterate the opinion, that it is the best preparation of Sarsaparilla in use, and the addition of Iodide of Potash enhances its value tenfold. Very respectfully yours,

TRUTH OMNIPOTENT.—We give to our readers and the public generally the following copy of a letter received by us from A. W. Veasy, Esq., of the Aberdeen Conservative, enclosing at the same time a communication to that paper from Colonel Vasser, of North Mississippi, and who was formerly associate editor of the Conservative. The subject of the letter and communication we do not feel it necessary to comment on—they tell the whole story, one that ought to go home to those in whose hands the rising generation of children are placed for nurture and for care. All we ask of our readers is a careful perusal of the documents.

CONSERVATIVE OFFICE,
Aberdeen, Miss., August 23d, 1858.

Messrs. Wright & Co.—As any testimonial in reference to your preparations may prove beneficial to you, I enclose the following, published at my request; in the "Conservative" of the 21st inst.

Col. Vasser was formerly associate editor of the "Conservative," and is well known in North Mississippi, as a gentleman of intelligence and strict integrity. Respectfully, J. W. VEASY.

[For the Conservative.]

Communicated. ASHALEN, Aug. 19th, 1858.

DEAR VEASY: Upon the principles of justice and humanity, I am induced to ask your permission to insert this communication in your paper, believing, as I do, that it may be the means of preventing untimely sorrow in many a happy household.

On Friday last, having been for several days previous absent from my family, I found, on my return home, that my infant, aged about 15 months, was quite unwell, from some unknown cause—supposed to be teething. Upon an examination, however, I was of the opinion that her indisposition proceeded from worms; and having been told by a respectable physician that WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE was a never-eign remedy against this terrible enemy of children, I was induced to give it a trial, reluctantly, by the acquiescence of my family Physician.

On the following morning, (Saturday) I commenced administering it by directions, save in quantity, being afraid to give the amount of prescription. I was unable to detect any impression occasioned by it until late in the afternoon of that day; and should not then, but for the discharge of some thirteen worms, varying in length from two and a half to six inches. This I thought a remarkable number for a nursing infant. But, to my great amazement, about one o'clock the next morning I was aroused from my slumber to witness the incredible number of one hundred and thirty-six from one evacuation.

Before breakfast of the same morning, (Sunday) but one small dose was administered, which was followed by the discharge of fifty during the day. The next day, (Monday) none was administered; but still occasional discharges occurred during the day, varying in size and quantity as described.

On Tuesday morning following, one more small dose was administered, making in all five doses of a quarter of a teaspoonful instead of a half as prescribed by the label of directions. In all, the little creature has discharged to this date, the rise of three hundred worms, a majority of which will average five or six inches in length; and is running about as usual, with returning evidences of good health and spirits.

Having met with such astonishing effects in the case of my infant, I was induced to use the Vermifuge on six other children under my protection, varying in age from two to ten years old, and in every case save one, (that of the oldest) the like happy results have been produced.

These facts are elicited, 1st, because of my antipathy heretofore to nostrums of every kind; and, 2nd, because my experience has convinced me that, in the experiment I have made with WINER'S CANADIAN VERMIFUGE, it is due to suffering humanity, as well as the manufacturer of the medicine, to make public the results of my observation.

W. H. VASSER.

LETTER FROM CRAWFORD-HOUSE, WHITE MOUNTAINS.

Lake Winnepisseogee—Boat Ride—The Notch—The Wiley-House—Ascent of Mount Washington—Yankee Enterprise—Crawford-House.

On Monday morning I left Dover, New Hampshire, on the Dochecho railroad, en route to the White Hills, which have won for the "Granite State" the no-mean distinction of the Switzerland of America. A ride of twenty-eight miles brought me to "Merry-meeting Bay," on the beautiful Lake Winnepisseogee—the Indian signification of which is, "Smile of the Great Spirit." A neat, little low-pressure steamer was in waiting to bear us over the lake; and, for three hours, I enjoyed the exquisite pleasure of a boat-ride over this most beautiful of all New England lakes. It has three hundred and sixty-five islands which, like precious gems, jewel the silvery bosom of the lake. It has an elevation of four hundred and seventy-two feet, above the level of the sea; and is walled in by precipitous mountains on every side.

Arriving at the Centre Harbor I found the stage waiting on the wharf, and soon was leaving dusty miles behind me, as we neared Conway the place of rest for the night.

After a comfortable rest I started again next morning for the Crawford-House, situated at the notch of the White Mountains.

The drive is, unquestionably, through the finest scenery in North America. The places of peculiar interest along the route are too numerous to be described in a communication—so I will commence at the Crawford-House vicinity.

The "Notch," as its name indicates, is a narrow opening in the mountains, accidentally discovered, by which we are enabled to penetrate into the great rotunda of the mountains. At one end, immediately under the frowning granite brows of Mount Webster and Mount Wiley, is situated the Wiley-House, rendered memorable by the destruction of an entire family by an avalanche of stone, on the night of the 28th of August, 1826.

There are several interesting profiles on the mountain sides, viz.: the "old maid of the mountain," the young man of the mountain," the "devil's pulpit" and den"—the names of which are sufficiently descriptive. There are, also, many silvery cascades of beautiful descent—fine subjects for the artists pencil.

On Thursday I made the ascent of Mount Washington, on a graceful and sure-footed Canadian pony, in company with forty other persons. This mountain is the highest in the range—its height, above the level of the sea, is 6258 feet. It took our party some eleven hours to ascend and descend—giving us two hours upon the summit—where we enjoyed a fine dinner, at a small hotel erected by Yankee enterprize, of granite bowlders and a few planks that were carried up upon the shoulders of brawny men. The name of the hotel is the "Tip-top House." No one can form a proper idea of the difficulties of Napoleon, in passing his army over St. Bernard, until after he has climed the rugged sides of Mount Washington. The route to this peak lies over Mount Clinton, Mount Pleasant, Mount Franklin, and Mount Monroe, and up the difficult crags of Washington itself. The distance from Crawford-House to the summit of Monet Washington is nine miles.

The top of the mountain is entirely bare, and nothing is found there but rocks and water. There is no snow in August, except a little that some deep ravine shuts out from the smiling sun. I will not attempt a description of the excessive views that are unfolded to the ravished eye of the tourist, in his ascension to Mount Washington. These are more fit for a poet's fancy than a letter-writer's pen—so I leave them.

I must not neglect a tribute to the Crawford-House before I close. Last 30th day of April, the original house was burned to the ground. The reconstruction commenced on the 9th day of May, and now a commodious hotel opens its spacious chambers and halls to visitors. Everything is done by the proprietors for the comfort of the guests—the tourist will meet with a smiling brace of landlords and courteous attachees, and all the appointments he would expect to see in a crowded metropolis.

In conclusion, I would urge Southerners to turn their attention more to this romantic region than hitherto. Sublime scenery, bracing air and limpid waters, will furnish pleasures far greater than those experienced at watering places.

This letter is hastily written, in the midst of the noise and bustle of an hotel-office, and but illy covers ground which is now furnishing material for a book from the elegant pen of T. Starr King, D.D. of Boston.

To-morrow morning I leave, for other points. For the present, a hasty farewell. H. A. M. Henderson.

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

Strict Preaching—Closing the Grog-shops—Croton-Water Panic—Independent Congregational Methodists—Dr. Milburn—New Book—Steven's History—Drs. Bangs, Dempster, Stevens—Hog War—Deaths in the City—Camp-Meeting—Dr. Alexander—Dr. A. Clarke—Dr. Holdich.

The New York East Missionary Society, just organized—by permission of the Mayor—had service in an open lot, corner 29th street and 1st Avenue, on last Sabbath. A sermon was preached by Dr. Roche of the 17th street church to a large and attentive congregation. The day was delightful, and good order prevailed. These exercises will be continued during the mild weather. Two years ago, in Mayor Wood's day, a similar effort was made—but a mob broke up the meeting and run every body home.

The closing the grog-shops here, about 10,000, is mere outside show—as nothing but the front doors are closed, nearly all having private entrances through which thousands advance on their way to destruction; and the "New York Herald," and all the Sunday, German and infidel papers, are pouring out their wrath on the Sabbath and its institutions—denying that it is sanctioned by the word of God—making it only a day of recreation, amusement and sin.

A great excitement has been kept up for two weeks, in consequence of a report that the Croton-water (the city supply) was in a terrible condition, in smell and taste; thousands resorted to pump, rain-water, beer, etc.; every body seemed to smell and taste it after being told of it—few before. The panic is over, the water is good.

Dr. or Professor Mattison set up for himself last fall in this city, and he has been followed in Western New York by a number of other ministers, who imagine themselves wiser than their fathers and better than the Church. Bad men are like bad sores, they will break out and run, and, after running awhile, they dry up.

Dr. Milburn's book—"Ten Years of a Preacher's Life"—is out, and will have a very large sale. "Kirwan," or, Dr. Murray, has paid the work a high compliment.

Dr. Bangs is now in his eighty-first year! and lately attended the Huntington camp-meeting, full of the genuine Methodist fire. He preaches nearly every Sabbath.

Drs. Stevens and Dempster I heard last week, both preaching with great beauty and power.

The "hog war" has been prolonged and desperate, but the enemy has nearly disappeared; about two thousand having had their residence changed, from city to country air.

The mortality of the city last week, exceeded 700; over 500 of this number being small children.

The recent camp-meetings near New York have been largely attended, well ordered, and greatly blessed from on high.

The congregation of the late Dr. Alexander are raising $25,000, as a fund for the permanent support of his family.

Ethridge's Life of Dr. Adam Clarke has been issued at the Book-room, and is a most interesting and able work on the life of that wonderful man. Dr. Holdrich, of the American Bible Society, is now in Europe on its behalf.

SOUTH CANE BRAKE COLORED MISSION, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Ma. Editor: I send, for publication in your excellent paper, my third Quarterly Report for this Mission. Ten colored and three white congregations are regularly served by the missionary. At some of the appointments, the negroes from several plantations unite together in one congregation—and I will remark, by the way, that this is the only plan by which the great mass of the colored population can ever be reached.

Let the planters unite, and build Churches or send their servants to those already built; and let the motive in uniting together be, not the lessening of individual contribution to the support of the work, but the accomplishment of the largest amount of good.

I will take the occasion to mention in this place some of the discouragements attendant upon a work of this kind.

1. The patrons sometimes become discouraged, when results do not meet their expectations. If the negroes are not all converted by preaching a few sermons they are ready, and, I am afraid, sometimes too willing to conclude that efforts to enlighten and convert them are fruitless. They seem to forget the millions of white people who are still unconverted, notwithstanding they have been blessed with a thousand fold more advantages than those conferred upon the negro.

2. Others look unfavorably upon our efforts to convert and save the negro, because it sometimes happens that a negro, professing Christianity is detected in some crime, or, something wrong is done at a place of public worship. Permit me to mention one case, in point, a negro carried some whisky into a forest near a church on a day of public worship, some white men bought it, and got drunk on it.

This is a strong argument, perhaps, in the judgment of some, for keeping negroes from the sanctuary of God.

With some, the manifestation of feeling exhibited by the negro is a stumbling in their way. He does not grunt in exact accordance with their notions; or, perhaps, he sways his body to and fro while singing.

Happy would be the results, if all the owners of slaves in our country but felt their responsibility, and acted in view of the judgment-seat of Christ.

I will close by saying, that I regard their mission as in a hopeful condition: seven have been admitted on trial—twelve children and two adults have been baptized.

J. C. Huckabee

CHAPTER OF CURIOSITIES IN SCIENCE.

The water which drowns us as a fluent stream, can be walked upon as ice. The bullet which, when fired from a musket, carries death, will be harmless if ground to dust before being fired. The crystalized part of the oil of roses, so grateful in its fragrance—a solid at ordinary temperatures, though readily volatile—is a compound substance, containing exactly the same elements, and in exactly the same proportions, as the gas with which we light our streets. The tea which we daily drink with benefit and pleasure, produces palpitations, nervous tremblings and even paralysis, if taken to excess; yet the peculiar organic agent called theine, to which tea owes its qualities, may be taken by itself (as theine, not as tea,) without any appreciable effect. The water which will allay all our burning thirst, augments it when congealed into snow; so that Captain Ross declared the natives of the Arctic regions preferred enduring the utmost extremity of thirst rather than attempt to remove it by eating snow, but if the snow be melted, it becomes drinkable water. If melted before entering the mouth, it assuages thirst like water; but when melted in the mouth, it has the opposite effect. To render this paradox the more striking, we have only to remember that ice, which melts more slowly than snow in the mouth, is very efficient in allaying thirst.

There are many other wonderful paradoxes and curiosities in science; a few more of these we subjoin, in the form of question and answer:

How much quicker will seeds germinate under a blue glass than when exposed to the full action of light? Seeds which ordinarily require ten or twelve days for germination, will germinate under a blue glass in two or three.

Why will seeds germinate more readily under a blue glass than in any other condition? Because the blue glass permits the chemical principle of light to pass freely, and excludes in a degree the heat and light.

Why is it impossible to make seeds germinate under a yellow glass? Because a yellow glass excludes all the chemical influence of the sun's rays.

How do plants acquire the carbon of which their structure is in a great measure composed? They obtain it from carbonic acid, which they abstract from the atmosphere under the influence of light.

By whom was the identity of lightning and electricity first established? By Dr. Franklin, at Philadelphia, in 1752. The manner in which this fact was demonstrated was as follows: Having made a kite of a large silk handkerchief stretched upon a frame, and placed upon it a pointed iron wire connected with the string, he raised it on the approach of a thunder storm. A key was attached to the lower end of the hempen string holding the kite, and to this one end of a silk ribbon was tied, the other end being fastened to a post; the kite was now insulated, and the experimenter awaited for a considerable time for the result with great solicitude; finally, indications of electricity began to appear on the string, and on Franklin presenting his knuckle to the key, he raised an electric spark; the rain beginning to descend wet the string, increased its conducting power, and vivid sparks in great abundance flashed from the key.

Why was the kite insulated when Franklin fastened the key to the post by the silk ribbon? Because the silk was a non-conductor, and would not allow the electricity received upon the kite to pass off by means of the string to the ground.

Was this experiment one of great danger and risk? It was, because the whole amount of electricity contained in the thunder cloud was liable to pass from it by means of the string to the earth, notwithstanding the use of the silk insulator.

What happened when the experiment was repeated in France? Streams of electric fire, nine and ten feet in length and nine and an inch in thickness darted spontaneously with loud reports from the end of the string confining the kite. During the succeeding year, Professor Richman, of St. Petersburg, in making experiments somewhat similar, and having his apparatus entirely insulated, was instantly killed.

Is a building more or less liable to be struck when furnished with a good lightning conductor? Lightning conductors do not, as many suppose, conduct the lightning towards the building upon which they are placed; they simply direct its course and facilitate the passage of the fluid in the most direct way to the earth, when only a discharge must inevitably occur; there is no attraction, but the lightning takes the road which offers the least resistance.

Are lightning conductors protective when even no visible discharge takes place? They are. They possess a very great preventive power, and gradually and silently disarm the clouds by drawing the electric fluid from them, and this process commences as soon as the clouds have approached a position vertically over the rod.—Professor Farraday recommends the location of lightning conductors inside rather than on the outside of building, and says that the lower end should be set into powdered charcoal.

What is the cause of a red sunset? The vapor of the air not being actually condensed into clouds, but only on a point of being condensed. In the same manner, if light be transmitted through steam mingled with the air, and therefore on the verge of condensation, it assumes a deep orange or red color.

What is the cause of a red sunrise? The vapor in the upper regions of the air is just on the point of being condensed.

Why is a red sunset an indication of a fine day to-morrow? Because, although watery vapor is in the air, it is probably only on the verge of incipient condensation, and not sufficiently so to form rain clouds; and this slowly progressive transition of vast volumes of the air through the temperature of the dew point, can only occur in serene weather at sunset and not at sunrise.

Why is a red and lowering sky at sunrise an indication of a wet day? The red and lowering appearance of the morning sky, which indicates foul weather, probably indicates such an excess of vapor being present in the whole atmosphere, that clouds are actually forming in the higher regions or upon the point of condensation which the rising sun cannot disperse. WHAT'S IN A DREAM?

The Western Christian Advocate publishes the following remarkable narrative. The high character of that journal requires that we receive the account as true, or at least that it has been told to the editor as true. Having ourselves "no faith in dreams" we can only remark that the Mr. B. in question was unusually favored, but we should scarcely advise any one, bachelor or widower, to delay his happiness until thus marvellously guided to the goal in "dreams and visions of the night."

A SINGULAR DREAM.

Mr. B. had been twice married, but was left a second time a widower with six daughters and one son. After these bereavements, Mr. B. inferred the Lord did not design him to enjoy the blessing of a wife, and he resolved to sacrifice all personal conveniences and enjoyments of the conjugal relation, and never attempt to select another partner in life. This resolution he sacredly kept for nearly three years, when the arguments and counsel of the minister of the circuit, in the State of Delaware, prevailed on him to change his mind. The consideration of his numerous family of daughters requiring so much a mother's care and instruction, was one of the strong reasons that had induced him to admit that his resolution might be founded in error. The minister, encouraged by the good impression he had made, and the influence he had gained over Mr. B., took the liberty to name to him a lady residing in a certain neighborhood of his circuit, who, he thought would make him an excellent wife and a good mother for his children, and appointed the time and place for Mr. B. to meet him and be introduced to her. Some occurrence took place which prevented Mr. B. from meeting the minister according to appointment.

The minister, intent upon his plan, procured Mr. B's consent to meet him a second time, and the appointment was made; but an unexpected Providence again prevented Mr. B. from being there at the time. They then made a third arrangement, and Mr. B. determined, if life and health permitted, he would certainly meet his friend, and be made acquainted with the lady recommended. Before the time arrived, however, Mr. B. was admonished in a dream that the woman so favorably spoken of by the minister was not the one he ought to marry, and he was conducted in a vision to the residence of the young lady who would be a suitable helpmate, and that Providence designed for him. The distance was sixty miles, and he had only traveled twenty miles in that direction. Yet the map of the whole road was laid before his mind, and the way he should go so distinctly marked in his dream, that he seemed perfectly familiar with all the road. He dreamed the distance, the name of the young woman, and the name of her step-father, Col. Vickers, the appearance of the house in which he lived, how it was painted; that it was situated near at hand. He dreamed also, that there were five young ladies belonging to the same family, and had the one selected for him so accurately described in his dream, that he could easily distinguish her from the other four.

In the morning he awoke and thought nothing of his vision, except as an ordinary and rather remarkable dream. The next night he had precisely the same vision repeated, and the same things presented to his mind in a still more vivid manner. Mr. B. then began to think that there might be some indication of Providence in his dream; and all that day he made it the subject of sincere prayer that God would direct him in the way he should go in a matter so grave, and involving so much interest to himself and his motherless children. That night he had the vision repeated the third time, and he determined then to follow the direction furnished him, and fully test the circumstances of the dream by a practical examination, and see if the results would be developed as he dreamed them. He immediately sent a note to the preacher, informing him that he had changed his mind, and must decline meeting him at the time appointed. Mr. B. started in the direction indicated by his vision, and after passing the twenty miles he was acquainted with, his dream was his only guide. He, however, had no difficulty; for the map of the road was so vividly impressed upon his mind, that he was able to distinguish his road from others. The gentleman whose name was given to him in his dream he had never seen or heard of. He knew the farm as soon as he saw it. The house and every thing about it appeared precisely as they had been presented in his vision.

He alighted from his horse and entered the beautiful house. The personal appearance of the young lady was so vividly impressed on his mind by the vision thrice repeated, that he readily recognized her in company of the four others, whom he found in the same family. He soon ascertained the name of the young woman, and found it to be Sarah T., according to his dream. This young lady had determined, and had often said, she never would marry a widower. Miss T. said the very moment she first saw Mr. B. she felt a strong tremor pass over her whole system. She had a vivid impression that he was a widower, and that he had come to see her. She afterward confessed that a sudden emotion of affection for him arose in her heart as soon as she came into his presence.

Mr. B. obtained the pleasure of an interview with her that evening, and, was successful in securing her consent to visit her again, and address her on the subject of marriage. He however, did not tell her his dream till she had engaged to become his wife. After a courtship of a few months they were happily married, and lived together for more than fifty years. Mr. B. died the 25th of March, 1842, and Mrs. B. lived till 7th April, 1847. For sixty years, perhaps, they were both distinguished and useful members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

PHRENOLOGY.

The August number of the Atlantic Monthly has some excellent articles. From "The Professor at the Breakfast Table" we clip the following, which expresses "our sentiments exactly" on Phrenology:

I shall begin, my friends, with the definition of a Pseudo science. A Pseudo-science consists of nomenclature, with a self-adjusting arrangement, by which all positive evidence, or such as favors its doctrines, is admitted, and all negative evidence, or such as tells against it, is excluded. It is invariably connected with some lucrative practical application. Its professors and practitioners are usually shrewd people; they are very serious with the public, but wink and laugh a good deal among themselves. The believing multitude consists of women of both sexes, feeble-minded Inquirers, political optimists, people who always get cheated in buying horses, philanthropists who insist on hurrying up the millennium, and others of this class, with here and there a clergyman, less frequently a lawyer, very rarely a physician, and almost never a horse-jocky or a member of the detective police. I did not say that Phrenology was one of the Pseudo-sciences.

A Pseudo-science does not necessarily consist wholly of lies. It may contain many truths, and even valuable ones. The rottenest bank starts with a little specie. It puts out a thousand promises to pay on the strength of a single dollar, but the dollar is very commonly a good one. The practitioners of the Pseudo-sciences know that common minds, after they have been baited with a real fact or two, will jump at the merest rag of a lie, or even at the bare hook. When we have once got found us, we are very apt to supply the next out of our own imagination. (How many persons can read Judges xv. 16 correctly the first time?) The Pseudo-sciences take advantage of this. I did not say that it was so with Phrenology.

I have rarely met a sensible man who would not allow that there was something in Phrenology. A broad, high forehead, it is commonly agreed, promises intellect; one that is "villaneous low" and has a huge hind-head back of it, is wont to mark an animal nature. I have as rarely met an unbiassed and sensible man who really believed in the bumps. It is observed, however, that persons with what the Phrenologists call "good heads" are more prone than others toward plenary belief in the doctrine.

It is so hard to prove a negative, that, if a man should assert that the moon was in truth a green cheese, formed by the coagulable substance of the Milky Way, and challenge me to prove the contrary, I might be puzzled. But if he offer to sell me a ton of this lunar cheese, I call on him to prove the truth of the caseous nature of our satellite, before I purchase.

It is not necessary to prove the falsity of the phrenological statement. It is only necessary to show that its truth is not proved, and cannot be by the common course of argument. The walls of the head are double, with a great air-chamber between them, over the smallest and most closely crowded "organs." Can you tell how much money there is in a safe, which also has thick double walls, by kneading its knobs with your fingers? So when a man fumbles about my forehead, and talks about the organs of Individuality, Size, etc., I trust him as much as I should if he felt of the outside of my strong-box and told me that there was a five dollar or a ten-dollar bill under this or that particular rivet. Perhaps there is; only he doesn't know any thing about it. But this is a point that I, the Professor, understand, my friends, or ought to, certainly, better than you do. The next argument you will appreciate.

I proceed, therefore, to explain the self-adjusting mechanism of Phrenology, which is very similar to that of the Pseudo-sciences. An example will show it most conveniently:

A. is a notorious thief. Messrs. Bumpus and Crane examine him and find a good-sized organ of Acquisitiveness. Positive fact for Phrenology. Casts and drawings of A. are multiplied, and the hump does not lose in the act of copying. I do not say it gained. What do you look so for? (to the boarders.)

Presently B. turns up, a bigger thief than A. But B. has no bump at all over Acquisitiveness. Negative fact; goes against Phrenology. Not a bit of it. Don't you see how small Conscientiousness is? That's the reason B. stole.

And then comes C., ten times as much a thief as either A. or B.,—used to steal before he was weaned, and would pick one of his own pockets and put its contents in another, if he could find no other way of committing petty larceny. Unfortunately, C. has a hollow, instead of a hump, over Acquisitiveness. Ah, but just look and see what a bump of Alimentiveness! Did not C. buy nuts and gingerbread, when a boy, with the money he stole? Of course you see why he is a thief, and how his example confirms our noble science.

At last comes along a case which is apparently a settler, for there is a little brain with vast and varied powers—a case like that of Byron, for instance. Then comes the grand reserve-reason which covers everything and renders it simply impossible ever to corner a Phrenologist.—"It is not the size alone, but the quality of an organ, which determines its degree of power."

O! oh! I see.—The argument may be briefly stated thus by the Phrenologist: "Heads I win, tails you lose." Well, that's convenient.

It must be confessed that Phrenology has a certain resemblance to the Pseudo-sciences. I did not say it was a Pseudo-science.

I have often met persons who have been altogether struck up and amazed at the accuracy with which some wandering Professor of Phrenology had read their characters written upon their skulls. Of course the Professor acquires his information solely through his cranial inspections and manipulations. What are you laughing at? (to the boarders.) But let us just suppose, for a moment, that a tolerably cunning fellow, who did not know or care anything about Phrenology, should open a shop and undertake to read off people's characters at fifty cents or a dollar apiece. Let us see how well he could get along without the "organs."

SCALE FROM 1 TO 10.

List of Faculties for Customers.	Private Notes for my Pupil. Each to be accompanied with a wink.
Amativeness, 7:	Most men love the conflicting sex, and all man love to be told they do.
Alimentiveness, 8:	Don't you see that he has burst off his lowest waistcoat button with feeding—hay?
Acquisitiveness, 8:	Of course, a middle-aged Yankee.
Approbativeness, 7:	Hat well brushed. Hair ditto. Mark the effect of that sign.
Self-esteem, 6:	His face shows that.
Benevolence, 9:	That'll please him.
Conscientiousness, 8:	That fraction looks first-rate.
Mirthfulness, 7.	Has laughed twice since he came in.
Ideality, 9:	That sounds well.
Form, Size, Weight, Color, Locality Eventuality, etc.	A ton: Average every thing that can't be guessed.

And so of the other faculties.

Of course, you know, that is not the way the Phrenologists do. They go only by the humps. What do you keep laughing so for? [To the boarders.] I only said that is the way I should practice "Phrenology" for a living.

END OF MY LECTURE.

NAPOLEON III. ET L'ITALIE.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, speaking of the "stunning" effect of the peace news, says:

Amid all this universal occupation with the same subject, it is strange that I find nobody, apparently, bearing in mind that if we had ventured to trust Louis Napoleon's own programme, put out before the war, we might have prophesied the denouement which now takes all by surprise.

In the pamphlet of Napoleon III. et l'Italie, which, though edited by M. Laguerroniere, was well known (on its appearance) to be the work of the Emperor, I find every particular of the Villafranca pact, either shadowed out or distinctly proclaimed, as a condition of the solution of the Italian difficulty. At page 11 the writer reminds us of the fact that in May, 1848, Austria was disposed to treat on the basis of a surrender of Lombardy, and an acceptance of the line of the Mincio as her Italian frontier; that this proposition was not considered satisfactory at that time by England; but that when in July Piedmont professed herself anxious to re-open negotiations, and the same basis was submitted on her part by France and England, (acting as mediators between her and her enemy,) Austria, which had by that time retrieved her position, refused to entertain the terms she would have grasped at two months before. Again (page 18) the pamphleteer reminds us that Prussia made a similar proposition to the Diet at Frankfort, through General Rodovitz, but that it was rejected by the influence of Austria. So that Louis Napoleon may now say: "What the French Republic, the British Cabinet, and the Prussian Government altogether failed to effect, I, singly, have accomplished. Austria has been forced to accept from me the frontier line of the Mincio."

Again, the pamphlet (page 45) distinctly rejects the idea of Italian unity as a dream of revolutionary Utopianism, and sets up against it the scheme of a federation, under the Presidency of the Pope. This was the project so enthusiastically urged by Gioberti, Balbo, and their followers, in 1846 and 1847. It is striking that the pamphleteer (quoting page 51, the authority of Lord Punsonby, our Ambassador at Vienna in 1818) declares this to be the sole practicable mode of reconstituting Italy, though the scheme has no longer any adherents in Italy itself, having long since been consigned, there, to the limb of generous illusions.

Elsewhere (page 58) the pamphleteer thus describes the effect of the "honorary Presidency" he would assign to the Pope:

"It will increase the prestige and moral power of the Papacy; it will slacken the too tight bond which now couples the Prince to the Pontiff, and which cramps all the activity of a people in the inflexible circle of ecclesiastical power, at the risk of an explosion." "Receiving," the writer continues, "this increase of moral influence, finding himself invested with this sort of protectorate over all Italy, awarded him by the respect of all its peoples, the Pope may diminish his temporal power, and lighten the burden of his political responsibility, without self-humiliation. Without exposing himself, he may organize under himself serious control, secular administration, civil legislation, and a regularly constituted and independent magistracy. All he loses in privilege he will gain in importance. Instead of governing a stagnant and inert people, he will extend his hand over the whole of Italy, to bless and guide it; he will be the irresponsible and venerated chief of a confederation of twenty-six millions of Christians, who classed in different States, gather all to that centre, in which the activity and grandeur of Italy will come to a focus."

THE SHINING VOLUME.

Messrs. Editors: If my heart has ever been thankful for anything, it is that there is one book that may well be called "the Shining Volume." For years, I passed over its letters and chapters, as the Mexican of old trod the soil of California, little conscious of the golden ore beneath. I now read the letters, and find them the key to the richest treasury of God's love. As the spring strives to fill every nook and corner with grass and flowers, so the Bible seeks to fill every part of itself with that which shall benefit or please. Not less wonderful is this book in the condensation of truth than for its mighty strides in the development of its doctrines. It does not stop to inquire, "Will man see clearly the connection between sovereignty and free agency;" but since both doctrines are true, it stretches out the first as long as eternity, and presses out the second to the very circumference of the human faculties. Many times have I passed by the Bible House in New York, and looked up to the emblematic Savior pointing to the Holy Bible; never do I do this without feeling my heart throb with joy. Below, fourth Avenue is full of bustle, noises and dust; men of every diversity of character are jostling along together; it is a fit representation of the world when Christ shall rise up to pronounce to sin and commotion, "peace, be still!"

How I like to hear the Bible read without comment. I never heard a minister comment as he read a chapter before service, without feeling that all but the divine word was a loss. The Bible reminds me of the "Pilgrim's Progress Illustrated." Here we are called upon to be faithful, and Abraham is presented as the illustration. It is said, "Blessed are the meek," and the lawgiver appears as the patron. What an arithmetic would be without examples to illustrate the rules, that the Bible would be without its life-histories and parables. But while

"A story gilds the sacred page, majestic like the sun."

What emphasis is given to its holy truths by their illustration in human action. It is well to imprint truth upon the retina from "the shining volume," but it is better to press it into the hand, to look it in the eye, and to act it upon the retina. Were I to give you a description of the Greek Slave you would have some idea of a magnificent piece of sculpture; but let me accompany you to the Dusseldorf Gallery and you would find that your imagination had yielded you a poor ideal of the real thing. I can imagine something of "Olympian Jupiter," the work of the immortal Phidias, but how meagre my conception compared with that in the mind of Phidias, which gave the statue birth. Now, from the Bible, we get a fair idea of benevolence, kindness and love; but how stinted compared with that which we shall have when we see Jesus, in whom all beauty benevolence and love are perfected. J. P. B.

THE HUGUENOTS OF AMERICA.

In 1690, William the Third sent a body of Huguenots, who had followed him from Holland to England, to the Province of Virginia. They had a settlement on James River, above Richmond, called the "Manakin Town," after an Indian tribe. In 1699 it was increased by three hundred families, and the next year one hundred more arrived from Canada. Philip de Richbourg was for a long time their spiritual counsellor, and afterwards conducted part of his flock to the banks of the Trent, in North Carolina. Thence they were compelled by the Indians to fly, and emigrated to South Carolina, which became their permanent abode. As early as 1666, the Legislature of both Maryland and Virginia granted naturalization to the French Protestant emigrants of these provinces. In 1697 the same political privilege was extended to these refugees in the two Carolinas, and in 1793 to the New York emigrants.

South Carolina was styled the "Home of the Huguenots," from becoming their principal retreat in the new world. One thousand embarked for "La Carolina" from the ports of Holland alone. The expeditions left Rotterdam, touching in England, on the voyage to America; Isaac Mazieg came over in one of them. He had long been a merchant in Rhe; and settling in Charleston, amassed a large fortune, which he used for his adopted country. In 1687 the Lord Commissioners of James the Second, by the royal bounty, sent six hundred English and French emigrants to Carolina.

Jean Pierre Pury, of Neufchatel, emigrated to Carolina in the year 1723, with 375 Protestant families from Switzerland. To this company the British Government liberally granted 40,000 acres of land, with £4 sterling to each adult. The settlements were again strengthened during 1764 by the accessions of 212 more voluntary exiles. Their pastor, named Pilabert, accompanied them from France, and they named their settlements New Bordeaux, in remembrance of the capital of Guyenne, their former home. In 1782 there were not less than 16,000 Protestants in South Carolina, and most of them French. One writer says: "They live like a tribe, like one family. Each one makes it a rule to assist his compatriot in his need, and to watch over his fortune and his reputation with the same care as his own."

In our glorious struggle for liberty, the French refugees zealously aided the cause of freedom. South Carolina was the first to adopt an Independent Constitution upon the news of the battle of Lexington; and Henry Laurens was the President of the Convention which took the important step. Among her militia and regular troops were many illustrious descendants of the Huguenots, as Francis Marion, Peter Bosquet, Samuel Legare, and Henry Peronneau.

It is a striking fact, that three of the seven Presidents who guided the deliberations of the Continental Congress, were descendants of the French Protestants, Henry Laurens, John Jay, and Elias Boudinot. Two of these, Boudinot and Jay, were also presiding officers of the American Bible Society.—Knickerbocker Magazine.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF LITERARY PEOPLE.

A correspondent of the Springfield Republican gives the following pen-and-ink sketches of prominent literary people:

Emerson looks a refined farmer, meditative and quiet. Longfellow like a good natured beef-eater. Holmes like a ready-to-laugh little body, wishing only to be "as funny as he can." Everett seems only to be the graceful gentleman who has been handsome. Beecher a ruddy, frolicking boy. Whittier the most retiring of Quakers. And thus I might name others. Not one of these gentlemen can be called handsome, unless we except Beecher who might be a deal handsomer. Mrs. Sigourney, the grandmother of American "female" literature, in her prime (if we may believe her portait) was quite handsome. Katherine Beecher is homely. Mrs. Beecher Stowe is so ordinary in looks that she has been taken for Mrs. Stowe's "Biddy." Mrs. E. F. Ellet looks like a washerwoman. Margaret Fuller was plain. Charlotte Cushman has a face, marked as Daniel Webster's and quite as strong. So has Elizabeth Blackwell. Harriet Hosmer looks like a man. Mrs. Oakes Smith is considered handsome. Mrs Julia Ward Howe has been a New York belle. Frances S. Osgood had a lovely, womanly face. Amelia E. Welby was almost beautiful; Sarah Hale, in her young days, quite, unless her picture flits. The Davidson sisters, as well as their gifted mother, possessed beauty. If we cross the ocean we find Madame de Stael was a fright; but Hannah Moore was handsome; Elisabeth Fry, glorious; Letitia Landon, pretty; Mrs. Hemans wondrously lovely; Mary Howit, fair and matronly; Mrs. Norton, regally beautiful; Elizabeth Barrett Browning in physique is angular, and though she has magnificent eyes, her face is suggestive of a tombstone. Charlotte Bronte had a look in her eyes better than all beauty of features. But if we look at British men of first class craniums—Shakespeare and Milton were handsome; Dr. Johnson was a monster of ugliness; so were Goldsmith and Pope; Addison was tolerably handsome; and Coleridge, Shelley, Byron, Moore, Campbell, Burns, all were uncomely so. Sir Walter Scott looked very ordinary, in spite of his fine head. Macauly is homely. Bulwer nearly hideous, although a dandy. Charles Dickens is called handsome, but covered with jewelry, he can but look like a simpleton.

AUTOGRAPHS.

The passion for collecting autographs never raged so high in England as at present. The demand has been the means of bringing out from the portfolios of old families, where they have been resting as heir-looms for a century or more, many of the rarest and most desirable autographs known. At the sale of Mr. Dawson Turner's collection of manuscripts, which lately took place in London, they brought very high prices. This collection the Illustrated News pronounces to be "in every respect the most remarkable that has been scattered in our time." Among others was a collection of royal English letters, which were bought by the British Museum at high prices. Four letters in the handwriting of Oliver Cromwell, brought severally, £25,5s., £31,10s, a like sum, and £47, 5s. Milton's receipt for an installment of the payment due on "Paradise Lost," with his widow's receipt for a further sum, was sold for £13,1s. One of these letters contains the following characteristic passage: "I beseech you bee careful what captaines of horse you chose, what men be mounted; a few honest men are better than numbers. I had rather have a plain-russet-coated captaine, that knows what hee fights for, and loves what hee knowses, than that which you call a gentleman, and is nothing else."

Connected with autographs, it is a singular fact that the only autograph or specimen of writing known of Harvay, the great discoverer of the circulation of the blood, is his name in an album. This was recently sold for £20. It is said that all that remains of Shakspeare's handwriting are the words "by me," and his signature on five different occasions.

The recent measures of the Belgian Government, and especially the projected additions to the fortifications of Antwerp, have excited much attention and considerable uneasiness at Paris.

NEW ORLEANS:

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1859.

NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

THE volume of the Advocate will hereafter begin and end with the year; and it is very desirable that subscriptions should conform to this rule.

Therefore new subscribers, who do not begin with the year, will receive, and not two dollars, but an amount sufficient to pay for the paper till the end of the year, at the rate of FORTY CENTS A WEEK.

Thus, every subscriber will know, without being informed, that at the beginning of the year is the time to remit the subscription money.

Many accounts having been sent out before this arrangement was made, we shall not be able, until next year, to make the accounts of old subscribers conform to this rule.

Our Agents will please notice, and help us in this desirable arrangement. It is an approximation to the cash system, without its objections, and will obviate confusion in accounts.

A STATEMENT of the Receipts and Exports of Produce, and of the general business of this Port, for the year ending August 31, 1860, will be found on our fourth page. The reader will perceive the error in the date—1860, of course should be 1859. The Statement will be found of interest to most of our readers. Our young friends, we trust, will pardon the use of their column.

MINISTERS SHOULD BE PUBLIC SPIRITED MEN—EXAMPLES FROM DIFFERENT CLASSES.

Rev. Dr. MURRAY is writing a series of articles in the N. Y. Observer, upon the various aspects of the ministerial character and calling; his last one is upon the importance of public spirit on the part of the ministry. His description of different men is so striking and just, that I want your readers to have the benefit of perusing it. I have taken the liberty to assign two or three of them their position in respect to churches. I have been an observer upon this subject for many years, and have regretted many things I have seen. The first illustration given is furnished by Dr. Chalmers; his Church is known.

Perhaps there is not a point connected with the pulpit, preachers, or preaching, which may not be illustrated from the life of Dr. Chalmers. His ministry was a glorious one to the Church and to the world; and whilst it was by his pulpit ministrations he made the deep impression upon his race which survives him, and which will survive the lapse of ages, yet to what a remarkable degree did he devote himself to the promotion of the great interests of society. We find him at one time writing on Political Economy, to encourage Britain when dispirited by the Berlin decree of Bonaparte; at another, seeking to enlighten the world on the best way of improving the temporal condition of the poor; at another, forming a penny-a-week society to aid in circulating the Bible; at another, thundering in the General Assembly against "Pluralities;" at another, following the poor to their wretched abodes in the most narrow wynds of Glasgow; at another, multiplying schools to meet the wants of his people; at another, organizing and directing Sunday-schools; at another, traveling through England in search of poor-law statistics; at another, defending the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church;—and, when the Free Church went forth from the Established, descending with a minuteness of detail to everything which entered into its stability and rightful position, as if his whole previous life had been spent among details! He permitted nothing to escape his notice: and he thought nothing beneath him that could in any degree promote the general interests of society. O, what a contrast does this great man present to many a minister who would think it undignified to go into the streets, without his gloves, cane and other regimentals, and who perhaps has never spent a week in his life in seeking out the neglected poor who are perishing for lack of the gospel beneath the shadow of his steeple! Never did uninspired man preach Christ more fervently; never did man labor more to promote the general interests of society.

I mean no offence, but I am inclined to think that the following case is a Methodist, at least, I have known many among us to whom many parts of this description might be applied. The neglect of pastoral duties is the crying evil among us. Occasional protracted meetings and revivals will never atone for such neglects as those named above. More public spirit is needed among us. I know a clergyman who went to reside in a city less than two years since, a man of no remarkable talents, yet by his taking hold of matters in which the community is interested, he shot away ahead of men who had lived in that city from fifteen to twenty-five years.

The Rev. Dr. A. is a good, sensible, and pious man. He is no extremist by all. With proper zeal and expanded views, he might be greatly useful: but he is satisfied with the performance of the usual Sabbath services, and of the pressing parochial duties. His parish is his farm; and even that is not well cultivated. And everything around him is just like him, only a little more so. His salary is not paid. There is no monthly concert. The Sabbath-school languishes. The Church is sadly out of repair. The people are irregular in everything. There are no good schools. The young are wandering to other fields, and no wonder. And if Dr. A. gave the time to the general interests of the people that he gives to smoking cigars and to listless lounging, his parish might be in a flourishing state, instead of being, as it is, rapidly on the decline. And such ministers are far too numerous.

Nobody would hesitate a moment to locate the next gentleman. He belongs to "the Church." Not a few of your readers are acquainted with him. A surgical operation is needed on all such "cases," as they only sap the vital powers of the system, they are excrescences that never do any good. Off with ecclesiastical weeds!

The Rev. Mr. B. is a younger man, with zeal and sympathies; but with narrow views, far more Jewish than Christian. His zeal has only one direction—his own sect; his sympathies are withheld from every effort that tends not to its increase. He co-operates in nothing which has only in view the general interests of society. He is like a vein upon the body, which would draw everything to itself, at the expense of the entire system. He is simply the minister of a sect, and is alike unworthy of his calling and of the age in which he lives. The most intolerable men of this age are these ministers of a sect, who regard none as ministers of Christ but themselves—who regard no good as done, save done in their way, and who would rather see the world remain in darkness than that it should be illumined by others. These are spots in our feast of charity—clouds without rain, whose only object seems to be to obscure the bright shining of the gospel sun; that their farthing candles may be seen.

You may locate this last gentleman wherever you choose; no church will object to receive him which has the good of mankind at heart, and I trust you will assign him to no other. All the churches need such.

The Rev. Mr. D. was an excellent parish minister—was ardently attached to his own Church; but he was also a minister of Christ, and, with a quenchless zeal, ready to do good to all men as he had opportunity. The cause of education, of missions, of temperance—asylums for the blind—homes for the friendless—houses of delinquents—Sunday-schools, and schools for the poor, found in him a zealous and constant friend. On all fit occasions his voice was raised in their advocacy. His object was to elevate the race by enlightening them, and by leading them to a true faith in Christ; and he could rejoice in the good done and doing, regardless of the agency employed, if man only were benefited, and God was glorified. And such are the ministers the Church now needs: men in whose hearts the love of souls rises far higher than the love of sect; men who feel that for them there is no rest until the gospel is preached to every creature.

NOTES ON SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON'S FIRST LECTURE.

See Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic. Vol. I. Gould and Lincoln, 1859.

THE first volume of this great work has been recently issued by Gould and Lincoln, of Boston, Mass. We have had time merely to refresh our eyes with a glance at its opening pages, but a glance has been sufficient to show us that the volume is characterised by all those striking excellences of powerful thought, wide research and lucid statement, for which Sir William is so justly distinguished.

The opening lecture, delivered to his class in the University of Edinburgh, is full of strong points. It proposes to present the utility of Intellectual philosophy as a study: its peculiar adaptation to mental culture, and the special class of benefits to be expected from its pursuit. We have made a few notes on some of Sir William's views.

I. "Considered in itself, a science is valuable in proportion as its cultivation is immediately conducive to the mental improvement of the cultivator."

Sir William regards this as the absolute utility of a science. And this form of utility, he subdivides into two other utilities, viz: 1st, Science, as cultivating the mind by exercising its faculties; and 2nd, Science, as furnishing a "certain complement of truths or objects of knowledge." The philosophy of mind, according to his view, supplies to the higher faculties, the "occasions of their most vigorous and, therefore, their most improving exercise." Mental philosophy has a positive utility. "But what is the useful? That which is prized, not on its own account, but as conducive to the acquisition of something else." Mental philosophy is a means by which the powers of the mind are awakened and trained; hence, its utility. Two errors prevail on this subject. One consists "in viewing man not as an end unto himself, but merely as a mean organized for the sake of something out of himself." Led astray by this false view, men have regarded those branches of knowledge exclusively as useful "which tend to qualify a human being to act the lowly part of a dexterous instrument."

We are glad to see this earnest remonstrance against such an error. No one can deny, that what are called practical sciences are highly valuable, for our civilization depends upon them, and it is their office to put us in a position to inhabit the globe comfortably. But they are mainly subsidiary. They exist for objects beyond themselves. A man is a mechanic, not for the sake of mechanic art, but that he may be a man. So too, of law and medicine. Business is a means to manhood. But abstracter studies deal more directly with the mind, and their aim is to develop the faculties as such, and as irrespective of simple earthly ends. We have need of such sentiments. By all means, let us have practical education, but let us have something higher also. The immortal soul is not a tool, a machine, but a soul—and, as a soul, it ought to have its own life called out and perfected.

II. "Man, in so far as he is a mean for the glory of God, must be an end unto himself; for it is only in the accomplishment of his own perfection that, as a creator, he can manifest the glory of his Creator."

This is excellently said. If man be a means to glorify God, then, it is obvious that as man, he must perform this work—not as a creature of bodily wants, not as a portion of the material universe, but as a man—created in the image of God, fallen but redeemed by the blood of Christ. "In relation to all else, he is as end." But taken in actual life, man is diverted more or less from this paramount end by being compelled to provide for the necessities of his earthly condition. "In other words, he must exercise some trade, calling or profession." Sir William then proceeds to show, that although "the full and harmonious development of our faculties be the high and natural destination of all," yet this great end of man, considered absolutely, has been lost sight of, "and the term useful appropriated exclusively to those acquirements which have a value only to man, considered in his relative, lower, and accidental character of an instrument."

If man "liveth by bread alone;" if he has no higher attitude than as a mere member of society; if his work as a mechanic, a lawyer, a doctor, is his main work; then, on such ground, all the more elevated forms of culture and self-improvement may be abandoned. But viewing him in a truer and nobler aspect—viewing him as a living soul for living ends—the just idea of utility is that which contributes to the growth and perfection of his nature, regarded as a spiritual and immortal nature. Accordingly, the conception of time and circumstance, the impress of incidents and transient connections, must drop away from us, ere the idea of utility in its most significant sense can lodge itself within us. To be a man is incomparably greater than to be a statesman, a general, or anything else, simply and exclusively earthly. And hence, whatever studies tend to exalt us in this manhood are pre-eminently worthy of attention. Philosophy, considered in relation to the mind, promotes this end and, therefore, is entitled to special regard.

III. "Knowledge and intellectual development are not only not the same, but stand in no necessary proportion to each other."

This distinction is clearly presented. To cultivate the faculties is one thing; to acquire knowledge is another thing. The condition under which any power of the mind is developed, is exercise; and hence, the greater the exercise, the greater the culture or development of thought. "But a certain quantity of knowledge—in other words, a certain amount of possessed truths—does not suppose, as its condition, a corresponding sum of intellectual exercise."

So argues Sir William. And he argues justly. In acquiring knowledge, the receiving and appreciating powers are active, but in culture proper, the mind is aroused to a much higher state of energy. Thinking, looks to the relations of knowledge much more than to knowledge itself. It exercises the faculties in their interrelations the one to the other, rather than in their relation as a whole to objective facts. The genius of Sir Isaac Newton may be tasked to its utmost to discover and verify the laws of the solar system. But when discovered and verified, any ordinary intellect is competent to acquire a knowledge of them. The true method of education presupposes that the mind has an infinite value in itself, and, moreover, that through the activity of its own functions it is capable of high culture. And, consequently, whatever value knowledge may have in its objective utility, it has a better and much more important use, viz: its serviceableness as a stimulus to thought.

IV. "Is truth or is the mental exercise in the pursuit of truth, the superior end?"

Sir William asks this question. He considers it "the most important practical problem in the whole compass of philosophy." Says he, "at first sight, it seems even absurd to doubt that truth is more valuable than its pursuit." But, he urges, that "a slight consideration will however, expose its fallacy." This point is well argued, though, we confess, not to our complete satisfaction. "A truth, once known, falls into comparative insignificance." So it may, considered as involving the analytic or discovering or creative functions of the mind, but a truth, so known, may exert great influence and constantly sustain the action of the mind, by its call on the other attributes of the mind. "Absolute certainty and absolute completion would be the paralysis of any study;" no doubt of that, if the absoluteness covered the whole ground of possible intelligence; but, assuredly, there must be "absolute certainty" in some of the facts and principles of every study, or, the alternative is, that the mind has no firm foot-hold, and is thereby incapacitated for progress. Malebranche says: "If I held truth captive in my hand, I should open my hand and let it fly in order that I might again pursue and capture it." Lessing is still more emphatic: "Did the Almighty, holding in his right hand Truth, and in his left Search after Truth, deign to tender me the one I might prefer, in all humility, but without hesitation, I should request, Search after Truth."

It seems to us, that Sir William has rather over-stated this fact. The exercise of our faculties is a source of intense pleasure, and, without question, by this exercise we are chiefly cultivated; but it is difficult for us to see how the pursuit of truth could be maintained, and on what basis the mind itself could finally be established if there were no supreme excellence in the possession of the truth itself.

V. "But if speculative truth itself be only valuable as a mean of intellectual activity, those studies which determine the faculties to a more vigorous exertion, will, in every liberal sense, be better entitled absolutely to the name of useful, than those which with a greater complement of more certain facts awaken them to a less intense and, consequently, to a less improving exercise."

We can heartily subscribe to the inference here presented. The study of Geology, Chemistry, Botany, may afford "a greater complement of more certain facts," but it does not follow that they are better calculated to educate us than poetry and metaphysics. No doubt the former are more useful—much more useful in a commercial sense; and, they are so, because they are closely connected with man's earthly position and earthly circumstances. But it is impossible for them to contribute to the growth of mind, as mind, like the more liberal pursuits. A matter-of-fact man is a good citizen—he has generally a good position—keeps a good bank account; but if all the world were matter-of-fact men, we should not consider it a very desirable world in which to live. There are faculties within us that facts cannot reach—cannot educate—cannot develop. Facts are for the understanding; but whenever you touch the grander powers of our nature—whenever the problem is, whether the imagination shall stir the depths of being and the strength of the soul quickened to its utmost intensity, go forth to commune with the invisible and the eternal, we want something more than the figures of the multiplication-table, the angles of the mathematician and the statistics of the insurance-office. The real test of the useful is in its final relation to the soul—and, as Sir William subsequently argues, nothing can distinctly and without qualification be denominated useful except it subserve the great ends of our mental being.

We hope that the readers of the Advocate, and especially such of them as are officially related to the great work of education, will weigh well these views of the greatest metaphysician of the age, Sir William Hamilton. In this day of dollars and cents every thing is measured by its so-called practicalness. If men had just views of practicalness there would be no harm in the word, but, as things are, it is one of the most deceptious and pernicious terms in our language. Studies, that have for their aim, the ennoblement of mind and that, above all human studies tend to expand the soul for communion with God, are denounced as not practical—that is, they do not help men to dexterity in business, to political management, and to the idol, we call, success. And many a man who is doing a grand work, and that too in a grand way, is deemed impracticable and visionary just because he lives a higher life than money-brokers and shrewd capitalists.

Public opinion is sadly false on this subject. And we regret to see that, in many quarters where better notions ought to prevail, this sordid utilitarianism is asserting its debasing influence. It especially concerns us, in our educational efforts, to guard against this low and sensual philosophy. Let us set our standard of culture high, and let us strive to have some other ideal of college-training than to teach men how to become good lawyers or doctors or statesmen. What we want is the ideal of manhood. It is a poor thing to be better as a tradesman or as a professional gentleman than as a man; and, yet this is precisely the standard that so many teachers set before their pupils. The strength of genuine manhood is the power that the church needs, and all other skill is only hand-craft compared with that majesty of character which now and ever rules the world.

MINISTERIAL IDLENESS.

THERE are certain forms of idleness to which the ministers of the gospel are peculiarly liable. We propose a friendly talk about them.

And first of all, one of the besetments of the minister grows out of the fact that, for the most of the week he has the free command of his time. Six days of the time he seldom has those engagements which are connected with fixed hours and set occasions. His work is not regular, in the sense in which a mechanic's work or a professional man's work is regular. If he choose, he can breakfast at seven or at nine o'clock in the morning, and he can enter his study immediately, or defer it until more agreeable. If he has, for the day, a pastoral call to make or a matter of Church-business to perform, he can most generally suit the time to his inclination. Now, just here, he is in danger. Idleness is almost sure to overtake a man who lives under such circumstances, and, ere aware, its strong chains are clasped and riveted on his life. A man, who has the choice of his whole time, and can select this hour or that for any specific task, is extremely apt to be an idler. The only safeguard is to systematize his work—to bind himself down to stated hours for every department of effort; and to hold himself amenable to conscience for the strictest attention to such self-imposed obligations. If, indeed, circumstances do not imperatively require this at the minister's hands, he will be all the more of a man and all the better Christian for assuming these restraints.

But again, a minister is exposed to idleness in his modes of study. Every man, who is called of God to be a minister, is called of God to be a student—to "give attendance to reading"—to become "a workman, that needeth not to be ashamed." We do not say, that he is called to be a scholar, a critic, a linguist, a writer; but, he is called to be a student, a close and laborious and patient thinker.

Now, many ministers who are really anxious to study, are great idlers intellectually, and hence, their "profiting" does not appear "to all" men nor, for that matter, to any man. The cause generally is in loose, careless and desultory study. A minister ought to be extremely particular as to the manner he reads. "How read est thou?" is a good question to ask him. The "how," is everything. If he reads, just to read; if he reads without minute analysis and earnest deliberation; if he reads in any way, that suspends the best action of his best faculties, then, let him be assured, he is idling; he is wasting time and wasting energy; and, whatever knowledge is gained, it is gained at the expense of intellectual ability to use that knowledge to the highest advantage.

About the best rule that we know is, to select the best books and then to master them, just as though you were to expound and teach them to others. Reading, if made a study, is a great help to vigor of thought, but otherwise it is a weakener. Books aid us most by what they suggest, rather than by what they elaborate. If you do not find your own talents working—working as if a fermenting principle had been introduced—then you are idling over that book.

Knowledge is essential—"knowledge is power"—yes, all true; but knowledge is never worth much to such as are mere knowledge-machines. If knowledge stirs your soul, then it is doing a good work—not otherwise.

Once more. A minister often idles by means of the careless manner in which he prepares for the pulpit. This carelessness is a grievous fault. If its ill effects were confined to the intellect, that were bad enough; but, unfortunately, it often consumes a man's spirituality. No one's soul can grow without much deep thinking; hence, if a minister fall into the habit of "getting up," hasty and poorly-prepared sermons, his heart must inevitably suffer. Most prayerfully and most elaborately ought he to work over these discourses—not to make an intellectual display of logic and rhetoric—but to seize the truth of God in its most truthful aspects, and to see that the sword of the spirit is not dulled and blunted in his hands. Some men argue as if God were a patron of lazy thinkers. No; this is all wrong. The more that a minister thinks and labors in fitting himself for the duties of the pulpit, provided he thinks and labors under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, the more likely is he to win souls.

Now, right here, in humble self-examination, let our Methodist ministers look into their hearts. See, is there no waste of God's substance? See, is there no laxity—no carelessness? See, are you not far below what you might be? Brethren, it is work within that produces work without. Our own souls—ah, here is the standard, to which Churches and congregations conform. Remember what we say—if our sermons are so lightly esteemed by us as to lend to no earnest, self-denying, laborious efforts in their preparation; depend upon it, our Churches and congregations will hold them in light estimation also. The "power of God" is dishonored whenever it becomes weakness in your hands, and such weakness it must become, unless you study hard, very hard, and pray much, very much.

DISTRICT MEETING—CAMDEN (ALABAMA) DISTRICT.

Pineville, Ala., August 15, 1859.

MR. EDITOR: Our District meeting, for Camden District, closed this evening after a very pleasant and useful session, and I am requested to send you some notes of it.

Brother Carmichael was called to the Chair, Brother A. C. Ramsey appointed Secretary. The attendance was not so full as we could have wished; but we had reports, official or otherwise, (sufficiently reliable) from the District generally.

The meeting, in the opportunities afforded for consultation, news from the various camps, Christian communion, brotherly love, and the beginning of friendships among fellow-laborers, hitherto strangers to each other, was one of the most pleasant I ever attended. In common with some others I went up, not so much prejudiced as indifferent; but, since I have seen the practical workings of a district meeting, I am compelled to think very favorably of them; and, I have no doubt if they were fully attended, and managed as this was, in the true spirit of Methodism, we would soon find them a recognized and permanent institution. Besides the actual work done, they serve a valuable purpose in cementing together preachers and laity, refreshing us with the sight of each others faces, removing the sense of loneliness and "forsakenness" which belongs to every "sentinel" who seldom sees his comrades, and awakening among us an esprit du corps, whereby we return to our work more zealous, cheerful and strong. But I should overlook the great desideratum of these meetings if I failed to notice the valuable aid they afford for mutual counsel and advisement—whereby the greatest good to the greatest number may be promoted.

Lest I trespass too much on your space, suffer me to close by handing you for publication the following resolutions passed at the meeting, and comprising all the proceedings which seemed to warrant publication.

* * * * * * *

Resolved, That we recommend to the preachers and official members of the Churches of this District, the keeping of a substantial Record Book in each Church, for recording marriages, baptisms, names of members, and such other particulars as are of interest, or need be presented.

Resolved, That we recommend to the preachers of this District uniform and strict adherence to our Book of Discipline, in the admission of members to probationary and full membership.

Resolved, That we recommend to the preachers of this District the importance and necessity of keeping a full record of such church trials as may occur during their administration; the same to be filed, as other records of the Church.

Resolved, That we respectfully recommend to our next Annual Conference, that the territory now embraced in Mount Pleasant Circuit, and in Hollywood and Fish River Circuit, be divided into three Circuits and a Mission; also, that the territory now embraced in Monroeville Circuit, be divided into two Circuits and a mission; also, that the territory now embraced in Cedar Creek Circuit, be divided into two Circuits, one to be called "Snow Hill Circuit," comprising Snow Hill, Warrenton, Monterey, Pine Flat, and Mount Carmel Churches; the other to be called "Oak Hill Circuit," comprising, Ebenezer, Society Hill, Jackson's Chapel, Pineville, and McKenzie Churches.

Resolved, That we respectfully recommend to our next Annual Conference, that the Hollywood and Fish River appointments be transferred to the Mobile District; and that the Camden District, thus altered, do so remain.

Resolved, That we build or buy a District parsonage. That the preachers in charge and the stewards of the District Churches be requested to take up collections for the accomplishment of this object: and that a committe of six be appointed to ascertain the best location for said parsonage, and to carry out the first clause of this resolution.

Under the above resolution the following brethren were unanimously chosen by the meeting. A. C. Ramsey, J. L. Godbold, Solomon Portiss, O. B. Savage, John W. Portiss, and John Sampey, Sr.

Resolved, That the prosperity of the Churches on this District, as shown by reports of their representations at this meeting, is a cause for devout thankfulness to God, and gratulation of each other.

Resolved, That our hearty thanks be, and they are, hereby tendered the citizens of Pineville, for their hospitality and kind attention to the members of this meeting.

Resolved, That such of our proceedings as have public interest, be published in the New Orleans Christian Advocate.

METHODISM IN RHODE ISLAND.

WE noticed a few days since, that C. C. Burleigh, the notorious Abolition Infidel, had been invited to deliver an address before the Conference Institution at East Greenwich, Rode Island. We felt curious at the time, to see what kind of an address he would make; and the following extract gratifies that curiosity to some extent. Thus, we see New England-Abolition-Methodism employing an unclean wretch to insult God, and blaspheme the Bible and religion—willing to give such a creature access to their children, and an opportunity to corrupt and ruin them—that they may honor the tool of an infidel party. Would not such men insult the Son of God, if he would not indorse their opinions.

Not long since, says the Texas Advocate, C. C. Burleigh, of the Abolition school, was invited to make an address before the Providence Conference Seminary, and the "Golden Age" was his theme. It contained the rankest infidelity, discarding God's word and advocating the Vestiges of Creation. Man, he seemed to believe, has been developed from a mollusk—Adam, Enoch, Moses, Abraham, were the first specimens of humanity above periwinkles, without their tails, (sine caudæ.) In the Providence Conference there are a good many English preachers, and of course radical on the subject of slavery. But should praying men invite such a man to address children, with unsound and infidel views of the scriptures, and scholars in an institution of Methodism, whose very existence and religious institutions his wicked teachings would destroy? These ultraists are dangerous in Church and State—disunionists to the peace and safety of both.

HOW CIRCUMSTANCES DO ALTER CASES!

BODILY exercises more or less remarkable attended upon the preaching of Methodists, both in England and America, from the beginning. One of the most common of these phenomena was the loss of bodily strength, a falling to the ground, helpless and unconscious. We have seen this times without count; and while we never thought it essential to a genuine work of grace, we knew it was not the effect of mere weakness or fanaticism. But any amount of opposition and ridicule has been brought to bear upon it by our good orderly friends of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches. They could not tolerate the idea that it was the result of Divine influence, and so they never calmly examined the case. But lo! a new set of facts appear: a great work is going forward in the Presbyterian Churches in Ireland, in which these same phenomena appear in an unmistakable form! Now they demand attention; there must be something real in them, for it is not the fanaticism of Methodism that produces them, as they appear among the sober, and reliable Presbyterians! That alters the case; and now our brethren of those Churches are treating the matter very tenderly; and, as far as they can do it so suddenly, they are admitting that this is one of the proofs that the work is genuine. Thus, what was fanatical with us, is orthodox with them. And so, one by one, every important fact and features of Methodism is receiving the endorsement of the Christian world. Every point in our theology has to be endorsed. The only reason why this has not been done long since is, its opponents have not condescended to understand it. No Calvinist in America, who has written against Arminianism, could tell now what it is. They never studied it. They may have read, Whithy, or some other semi-Pelegian or Arian, but they never studied Arminianism. But wisdom is justified of her children, wait a little friends, and providence will do still more for you.

THE crystal waters of the beautiful. San Pedro looked so cool and inviting that, while crossing, the passengers in each stage put out a mug upon the step, to sip the blessed beverage, for the refreshment of all. For a time, we were all hard drinkers. So soon as we could find a place level enough to stand still on, we stopped for breakfast.

In a few minutes the fire was kindled, the store-room opened and, the same old dingy bags appeared; and Ramon commenced his culinary operations. Judge Bush, a fellow-traveler, and one of the boundary commissioners between Texas and New Mexico, spread his blanket at some distance from the kitchen, and invited me to loll with him, remarking, the less you see, the better your appetite will be.

I took him at his word—for the early air, fresh and strong, and a walk up the mountain from the river, had brought me to feel that nourishment and strength were both desirable. As we had but little to cook—breakfast was soon ready and was dispatched very quick—often the fashion of taking medicine. The reasoning is, it is had to swallow, I must take it—the sooner it is down the better.

This resting place has a name—"the Painted Caves," so called, because the mouth of one or two of these mountain caverns have, on the wall, various figures of men and women and beasts—grotesquely drawn by some Indian artist. Some of the pictures are very rude and uncouth, others show some skill of design and power of execution. The colors are strong and flashy, according to savage taste, and the whole arrangement tells of Indian habits—the war-path and the chase.

Before resuming our journey we were notified to drink freely, and if possible to take water along, inasmuch as we should see no more for FORTY-FIVE MILES.

The day was exceedingly hot—the road dusty, and after all our precaution, we suffered. Never before did I realize the force of those Scripture passages which represent desire, by thirst. Water—water! oh! for water.

Imagination wandered to every clear, cool spring I ever knew, and mocked me with tantalizing recollections of many a precious draught. Passengers would ask for water as if the very knowledge of their distress would help you to relieve them. We had no rod to smite the mountain rock, and no stream followed us in the desert. We were "in a dry and thirsty land where no water is."

"How far to Fort Hudson, driver?" was the ever recurring question. The answer brought no relief—save that, every time, the answer satisfied us that the distance was growing less, and, that, if nothing happened, we should get there at last.

Some time after dark we reached the Fort, and such a rush to the bucket—such a demand for tin cups, you never saw. The first cup would about wet the mouth and throat; another and another must be swallowed before nature would even begin to relax her demand for water—water.

Our arrival was a grand event at the Fort. The stage was twenty-four hours behind time. The officers and men were full of apprehension that the Indians had been at mischief, and were on the look-out for tales of ambush, death and scalps. They seemed as glad to see us all alive and well as though we were old friends. Without the coming of the mail to these out-posts is almost the only incident that stirs the stagnation of their routine-life, and the only vital link between them and the world they have left. It is really pleasant to see nature work on these occasions. The heart pining for news from home—hope shining out from the eye; the glowing face, when the letter with the well-known superscription was handed over—the sad blank grief when the chilling announcement was made—none for you. I was just in the condition to appreciate both feelings—the gratified and the disappointed.

Lieutenant Jones, of the Army, on his way to Camp Stockton, was a passenger with us; and, as we were to camp for the night, he kindly introduced me to Lieutenant Ramsey, who insisted upon taking myself and family to his quarters. He stated that he was a bachelor, but could provide us a supper and a bed. These were luxuries I did not expect to meet on this journey, and thankfully accepted. A clean table, nice steak, coffee that was coffee, a loaf fresh from the oven, and then a bed—delightful "institution" always! but to a tired back and aching bones, what can be compared with it? In the Lieutenant's estimation were small favors; but to us, they were great blessings. The Lord reward him. I had just come to understand that "a cup of cold water" was no little boon—a good supper and clean lodging were beyond price.

We rose in the morning refreshed and ready for travel. After breakfast we bade our gentlemanly host farewell, and resumed our toilsome journey.

Before we start, I must say that Fort Hudson is a most picturesque place. A striking counterpart, in many respects, of Harper's Ferry—a scene of grandeur, Mr. Jefferson said, a man might well afford to cross the ocean to behold.

It is a cove in the mountains—high, dry and level. The San Pedro at its base, a liquid crescent, its borns of convenient access. The circumvallation is perfect, except at one point, where a long deep canon opens, and down which, day and night, the wind comes pouring like a charge of cavalry.

It is very refreshing to the weary traveler, sick of solitude and pining to see human habitation, to come to one of these military establishments. Here are human beings, neat houses, stores, shops, domestic sights and sounds—the lowing cow, the crowing cock, the cackling hen—the faithful watch-dog's bark; and, above all, yonder stream "The Stripes and Stars." "Here is still my country and my kind—friends are near. I am not all alone in the wide, wide world." Such reflections sprung up on this lonely path; and the Fort, though built for war, becomes the minister of peace.

I was very glad to see the "Captain" of our train laying in some provisions—and of a better kind. The day is beautiful, the wind fresh, the teams new, and our feelings and prospects decidedly improved.

After riding a mile or two we came to the encampment of a scouting party who had left the fort the evening before, on an exploring expedition among the mountains. The tents were struck and all was hustle. The scene was Oriental—Arabic. Instead of wagons, the horse and the camel were employed to carry baggage. Some thirty or forty of the "ships of the desert" were already loaded, others were waiting for their loads. The Arab himself was here too, learning the Anglo-Saxon the ways of the East.

The camel lies down to receive his burden. One huge old fellow excited my sympathies. He was down, and they had piled upon him an immense load. Among other things two huge barrels of water—one on each side; the command to rise was given, he made an honest effort, but failed; the burden was too heavy. After a little pause, he gathered all his strength and tried the second time, but so staggeringly that his burden turned, the balance was destroyed, and over he went on his broadside. The displaced cords cut him sorely, and his wailings were piteous. A human complaint could not have been more intelligible. It was a remonstrance against oppression, and a cry for deliverance.

In the lot were some camel colts—"to the manner born." The experiment with these animals in this country is claimed to be a success.

You may judge of the straightness of the road and the course of the river, when I tell you that we crossed the San Pedro eighteen times in twenty miles. The mountain scenery all along here is grand. I can only stop here to describe. It must be seen to be appreciated.

When we halted for our next meal, dissatisfied with the past, and observing that Ramon was spoiling a ham by cutting from the wrong end and in chunks instead of slices, I interfered, and begged the privilege of cooking my own breakfast. My request was granted. Very soon I had cut some twigs, sharpened the point, and had some fine thin slices broiling. Others imitated my example, and we had nearly as many cooks as passengers. Mrs. P. and the little girl were delighted with my performance. They pronounced it excellent, and sustained their judgment by eating heartily for the first time in many days.

About 9 P. M., having reached an open plain, we encamped. The mules were hobbled and had spent themselves for grazing; I had converted the stage into a tent; the rest had made their beds upon the ground; the last noise had died away; most of the party were fast asleep—when, suddenly, there was a stampede. The mules came rushing in in terror right over the sleepers. Everybody was on foot in an instant; pistols were demanded, and every eye (but mine, for I was too sleepy to be excited,) was peering into the darkness to behold a skulking Indian party, bent on theft or murder—perhaps both. All was commotion, wonder, alarm.

"What is it?" was on every tongue. After consultation and search, it was concluded that a prowling mule, on one of his nightly errands, had passed the mules and frightened them. It was clear that no Comanches were about; at any rate, they did not mean to attack us. Still a guard was stationed, and the rest retired to their fellows. The stage drivers amused themselves, and the brethren next day, by saying they were in more danger of being run over by the preachers than the mules; and that, between the two, they had hard work to save themselves. Many a joke was cracked upon the subject; and, as I was out of the scrape, I enjoyed the fun. Every night afterwards, in selecting a spot to lie down, the drivers affected to be very careful in providing against a stampede of the young preachers.

Next morning we started early, in order to reach a famous water station, called "Howard's Spring." The story told about this place is a little remarkable. Howard is the owner and conductor of a train—sometimes employed by the Government, I believe; and always passing from San Antonio to the Forts or to New Mexico and back again.

The camping ground, where the spring is, is a valley at the foot of the mountains, and through it there used to run a bold stream—the well-defined channel is still visible. In one of his expeditions Howard reached it, and stopped as usual to encamp; when, lo! the stream had disappeared. It is twenty or thirty miles to water on either side. Here was a predicament. Men and oxen were already exhausted by heat and thirst, and the expected supply was cut off. They explored the bed of the stream up and down, hoping to find a water-hole somewhere, but failed. A day or two were exhausted in the search. Finally, nearly where the road crosses the rocky ledges, Howard sat himself down in despair, believing that all were doomed to perish. Bending his head in his misery, all at once he thought he heard the trickling of water under ground. The sound revived him. It was a solid limestone rock on which he stood, but water was not far from the surface, or the murmur of its passage could not have reached his ear. Fortunately he had tools and blasting powder in one of his wagons. He set to work, and in about six feet, struck water. There is the spring, which appropriately bears his name. It is a curiosity. The hole in the rock is just large enough for one man to descend; there is no current at the bottom; no visible running in, as in a well; no boiling up, as in a spring—and yet the supply is inexhaustible.

On our arrival, a very large train was encamped; and on that morning, had watered three hundred head of horses, mules and oxen, besides what they had used for cooking. We had fourteen mules, and were thirsty ourselves; but the marvellous spring supplied us all, and gave no sign of failure.

The Comanches were there, too, a few hours before us. The water is clear, cool and palatable. The savage and the civilized enjoy it, and the last acknowledge it as a Providential blessing.

BOOK NOTICES.

WE ARE indebted to H. D. McGinnis, 36 Camp-street, for the following late publications:

LIFE OF JABEZ BUNTING, D. D.: with notices of contemporary persons and events. By his son Thomas Percival Bunting. Vol. 1. New York: Harpers & Bros. 1859. We are not prepared to pronounce upon this work as to the merit of its authorship, though the press speak favorably. It will be universally read by "the people called Methodists;" to whom the book is formally dedicated. Methodism has probably produced no greater man than Jabez Bunting.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA. By Charles McKay, LL.D., F.S.A.: New York: Harper & Brothers. This book has excited considerable interest, and will be generally read. It is in a tolerably fair spirit; better than Dickens by a long ways, and worth perusing.

AMERICAN WIT AND HUMOR.—Harper & Brothers. This is the contents of the Editor's Drawer of the Magazine. Published in book form.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE, AND GERALD FITZGERALD. Novels. Harper & Brothers.

TEN YEARS OF PREACHERS LIFE: Chapters from an Autobiography. By Wm. H. Milburn. New York: Derby & Jackson, 1859. Our readers will recognize the author as the distinguished blind preacher and the author of "the Rifle, Axe, and Saddle-bags." The present work fully sustains the reputation of the writer, and is of unflagging interest. There are pictures of Western Life—Life in the Woods—Life at the National Capital—interspersed with adventure, anecdote and personal sketches. We have it from H. D. McGinnis' 36 Camp Street.

NEW ORLEANS MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL, September 1859. This valuable periodical is to hand.

WILBUR FISK McGEHEE.

WILBUR FISK McGEHEE, son of Hon. Edward McGehee and Mary Barrass, was born Sept. 25th, 1839, and died August 1, 1859, at his father's residence in Wilkinson county, Mississippi.

He had just touched manhood, when he had to give up as fair as earthly future as ever kindled hope and aspiration in the young heart. He returned in May from the University of Virginia, his health prostrated by too great devotion to his studies. His "honors" followed him, but too late to cheer or please, except as he could hand them to his father in honorable testimonial of fidelity to his duty.

Wilbur was, in its legitimate and best sense, a gentleman—a self-forgetting, Christian gentleman. No circumstances of illness or weakness—the position, of being far from home, among strangers and unknown—did not make him selfish or thoughtless of others, or negligent of the smallest courtesies of life.

Pure and modest as a woman, he was, in all matters pertaining to right and duty, steadfast and unshrinking. His Christian life had no defaultings to mar its symetry, no lamentable mistakes and backslidings: but from twelve years to twenty—those "slippery paths for youth"—he was true to his profession, in circumstances when most other young men fail. Wilbur never wavered. At home he was loved to the utmost, and simply, "of course" and from kinship, by those who knew him best. As a son—he was loyal, docile, loving to obey; no position mode of him was "unreasonable;" with tender watchfulness anticipating his mother's wishes, and with honor-cheerfulness obeying his father. As a brother, he was kind, caring and full of praise—never neglecting to be polite, because he was a brother; as a friend, he was courteous, honorable and firm; as a Christian, he was humble, self-denying, distrusting—ever and only looking to Jesus.

His oldest brother, in a familiar note says of him, truly and faithfully: "his character were studies for me, furnishing a solitary example within my experience of such absolute purity. In dealing with him and in all my ministerings almost the idea was always present with me, of an inferior naturo offering service to a being of superior spiritual mould. When we brothers were gathered around him, I have often thought that we presented a picture of earthly beings endeavoring to tempt some visitor from an upper sphere to dwell with us, by tendering the perishable things of time—when his heart was fixed on things beyond. He was only lent to us—he now in his proper home."

His sickness was long, and most painful. How much he suffered, can never be estimated—never inferred from any complaint—for he was sternly silent and patiently submissive during the dark hours that seemed to him endless.

It is hard, in these times of wild riot and profligacy and reproach of Christ and deliberate selfishness, to lose from the family and from society one so full of promise, and, so already rich in performance. Still it is refreshing to know that such an incarnation of purity and piety has been in our midst, and left his brothers and friends a character so rounded and complete, so telling to hopeful and holy emulation. And here I will say that his position, of respect and admiration at College and at home, was achieved, not by intellectual superiority—for he had brothers of higher and stronger minds than his—but by his religious, steadfastness and unfailing Christian courtesy. This triumph of virtue was so manifest in his daily walk, and so winning in its gracious beauty, that tha most wanton and skeptical and self-indulgent could but admire and yearn, if only for a moment, to be like Wilbur McGehee. No heart-aches ever came to his parents while he lived; and from his grave, no incurable anguish at the thought of past delinquencies, which even death could not obliterate from the memory of the living—nay, rather, sets them in immortal horror. But the word about Wilbur, was, "he never carelessly or knowingly gave us pain." So said his father.

His whole life displaying this "tripple nobility of nature, culture and faith," leaves and receives this imperfect record. We love his memory, and "Willy" is often and lovingly with us in our family conversation. J. W. BURRUSS.

NEWS FROM OUR HOME WORK.

"To spread Scriptural Holiness over these Lands."

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Fayette Circuit.—REV. W. G. MILLARD writes: "Our circuit has been greatly blessed in several places during this year, by gracious revivals. We have received on probation over one hundred whites; besides, about one hundred have been received in full fellowship, from a list of probationers left us by Brother Thompson.

"We have just concluded a protracted meeting of ten day at Mt. Carmel, during which the spirit of God was abundantly poured out, and its power mightily displayed. Fifty-eight whites were added to the Church; about forty souls converted, and the Church set on fire of the Holy Ghost—much fruit remains yet to be seen from among many who were convicted. Brother H. J. Herris, and J. J. wheat were with us preaching in power and with great effect. Brother J. A. B. Jones was with us in the conclusion of our meeting; and gave us very timely aid. We are looking forward to still greater times at our approaching meetings. We have made a new appointment, preaching under a hush-arbor to good congregations. We have gathered a little band from the world of about fifteen; who have joined us, and are zealous converts.

"We expect to have a protracted meeting here in September, where we hope to organize a society. May the Lord help us."

Brookhaven Circuit.—REV. R. T. HENNINGTON writes: "We have just closed an interesting and profitable meeting at Monticello. Bros. Welburn and Johnson were present, and labored effectively. We had a refreshing season—thirteen joined on probation, several others acknowledged a deeper work of grace than they ever enjoyed before. There is a working up here on the subject of sanctification. One sister says: 'I never saw before how far I was below my priveledge—I am determined to have the blessing.' If the world is ever converted, this doctrino must do it. Let every preuchor faithfully preach it, and he need have no fears as to his success—a revival will invariably follow. Every thing short of this is as a light under a bushel. Let God be praised "for his wonderful works to the children of men."

VERY LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

France.

The triumph entry into Paris of the army of Italy took place on the 14th inst., and passed off with great eclat. The streets were crowded to excess, and the decoration and illuminations in the evening were on a grand scale. The Emperor and his staff headed the procession along the Boulevards from the Bastile to the Place Vendome, and were greeted with loud acclamations. The Empress and the Prince Imperial were stationed at the Place Vendome, and on arriving there the Emperor took up a position in front of the imperial stand, and the troops marched on. The defiling of the troops at the Place Vendome commenced at 10:30, and terminated at 2:30. The soldiers bearing the standards taken from the enemy were received with ovations.

The flags of those regiments which were torn by the enemy's fire excited the population to enthusiastic cheers. The weather was fine and the spectacle imposing, but somewhat monotonous.

On Sunday evening, a grand banquet was given by the Emperor to the principal chiefs in the army. About three hundred persons were invited.

At the close of the banquet the Emperor spoke as follows:

GENTLEMEN: The joy I experience at finding myself again with most of the chiefs of the army of Italy would be complete if it were not tinged with tha regret at beholding so soon the dissolution of the elements of a force so will orgaulzed and so formidable. As a sovereign and as Commander-in-Chief, I thank you again for your cnuilidence. It was flattering to me, who bud never commanded an army, to find so much obedience on the part of men who had great experience in warfare. If success has crowded our efforts, I am happy to attribute the greater part of it to those skillful and devoted Generals who rendered my command so easy, because, animated with a holy fire, they have necessarily given an example of duty and of disregard of death. A portion of our soldiers are about to return to their homes. You, yourselves, are about to resume the occupations of peace; nevertheless, do not forget what we have done together. Let the remembrance of obstacles overcome, of dangers eluded, of imperfections discovered, often recur to your minds. In commemoration of the Italian campaign I shall distribute a medal to all who took part in it, and I wish that to-day, you may be the first to wear it. May it recall no sumthines to your memory, and while reading the glorious names engraved thereon, let each exclaim, "If France has done so much for a friendly people, what would she not do for her own independence." I now propose the health of the army.

On account of the fete of the 5th the Emperor pardoned 1127 persons, sentenced to prison for various crimes, offences and infringements of the law, or reduced the terms of their imprisonment.

The Moniteur states that, the Emperor having decided on retaining for the present an army of 50,000 men in Lombardy, several corps which had much distinguished themselves in the late campaign could not be represented at the entry of the troops.

A local journal states that Lille is to be made the headquarters of a grand military command, with a Marshal of France at its head. It is thought the projected fortifications at Antwerp have had something to do with this measure.

M. Louis Blanc has addressed a letter to the London Daily News, in which he admits that Louis Napoleon could scarcely do more for the political exiles than he has just done, but asks "why should the exiles return to France?" He then replies, "Better stay in the land of unfettered thought and freedom—better live where an exile is to remain a man."

Italy.

Count Lhuti, the Mayor of Parma, who is now in Paris on a mission to the Emperor, has addressed the following letter to the Patrie:

Certain Journals have spoken of a Republican movement as having broken out in the city of Parma. You are authorized to give the most positive contradiction to this piece of false news.

I request you to declare that the most perfect order has not for a single instant ceased to prevail both in the town and in the Duchy. The people are too well aware of the importance of a regular and legitimate manifestation of their wishes to quit the path of legality for one moment. Unanimously resolved as they are to resist by every means—even by force, if necessary—any and every idea or attempt to restore the old dynasty, they are organizing actively, and their votes will on this very day prove to Europe that their one and only desire, conformably to their moral and material interests, is to be definitely united to Piedmont under the constitutional sceptre of the House of Savoy.

Modena.

The elections have been followed by admirable order. A great number of people took part in the elections, and distinguished persons and honorable patriots of all classes of society have been elected. Gen. Fanti, Marquis Fontanelli, Comte Itangoni, Chevalier Malmusi, Achille Menotti, Chevalier Chiesi, and Prof. Linli, are among those elected. The town and all other places in the Duchy are in fete.

Garibaldi had accepted the chief command of all the forces of the Centrality. He had arrived in Leghorn.

At Milan, on the 14th inst., the Municipality inaugurated a statue of Napoleon, by Canova, in the Place Brera, in the presence of Marshal Vaillant, the Sardinian authorities.

Great Britain.

On the prorogation of Parliament, prior to the delivery of the Queen's speech, Lord John Russell stated in reply to inquiries, that Mr. Bruce has been sent to Pekin with a view to the ratification of the treaty with China, and that it was the intention of the Government to require the Chinese Government fully to carry out the conditions of the treaty.

Lord Elcho inquired whether the present Government were really anxious that a volunteer force should be established.

Lord Palmerston and Sidney Herbert said it was the express desire of the Government to encourage the formation of rifle and artillery corps.

The official investigation into the loss of the steamship Argo had terminated, but the decision would not be made public until it had been communicated to the Board of Trade. It was understood, however, that the assessors gave it as their opinion that the loss of the ship did not arise from any wilful act on the part of the captain, but that it was a grave omission by him not to slow his vessel on the coming of the fog.

The Liverpool Albion, in stating that Sir W. Gore Ousely, was to be recalled, and announcing Mr. Whyke's projected departure for the Isthmus by the steamer which was to leave Southampton on the 17th of August, says:

Unless Mr. Whyke be crippled in his actions by secret dispatches from home, his countrymen may expect shortly to see some practical evidence of some policy, which, while respecting the rights of the republics of Central America, and assisting in the development of free routes of transit; shall at the same time maintain the rights of Her Majesty and her subjects.

Capt. Pember, of the ship John Fyfe, arrived at Glasgow, and G. B. Alma, the chief mate, were under arrest for having shot dead a seaman named John McArthur. Capt. P. is said to have fired a pistol at McArthur, after having been thwarted in an attempt to strike him with a handspike.

The Zurich Conference.

The following is from the Paris correspondent of the London News:

It is quite plain that the Zurich Conference has come to a dead lock. Official people now affect to be quite surprised at the difficulties which broke up the meeting ere it had well got together, and sent off the second Austrian Plenipotentiary, M. de Meysenburg to Vienna for further instructions. There must probably, they say, be a hitch about the Italian Confederation which meets with opposition both at Rome and Turin, and also about the restoration of the Dukes; perhaps, it is said, moreover, the exact proportion of the Austrian national debt which is to be saddled upon Lombardy cannot be easily agreed upon. Why, of course these difficulties start up, and everybody except the Emperor Napoleon's flatterers saw them from the first. Austria, who to a great extent has the cards in her own hands, since the Emperor cannot very well re-commence the war against her, is obstinate and insolent. She will make the most of a peace concluded hastily and from unavoidable motives in a spirit of hostility to all the principles in support of which the war was professedly undertaken.

The Vienna Gazette, so far from endorsing the opinion that the restoration of the Grand Dukes was only to be tolerated, or perhaps "favored" by the French Emperor, hails him to a positive engagement in that behalf. That restoration was, it says, "sanctioned by the signature of the two sovereigns, its execution guaranteed by their plighted word, and the power of the two monarchs is the sufficient assurance that the promise will be performed." The Presse of Vienna infers from this that the "French and Austrian armies will, if necessary, restore the Dukes and organize the Italian confederation by force." There are symptoms that the French Emperor is annoyed at the present conduct of tha Court of Vienna.

The Independance Belge thus comments upon the political situation:

One of our Paris correspondents writes that nothing is yet decided as to the text or even the spirit of the speech which the Emperor will pronounce on the 11th. It is greatly to be desired that it will be so worded as to leave no doubt whatever about the pacific intentions of the French Government. While the Patrie and Constitutionnel open their columns to pompous eulogies of Kossuth, and espouse the cause of Hungarian nationality with an ardor altogether inexplicable, the Pays, by the pen of M. Granier de Cassagnac, exalts the valor of the French army, and declares that no army in the world can stand against it. It is impossible to deny that the moment chosen for declamations of this sort is exceedingly ill timed.

Latest News.

The general and political news by the North Briton is not of an important character.

The latest advices from Italy represent the hostility to the return of the Grand Dukes as on the increase.

The National Assemblies of Modena and Tuscany had unanimously adopted resolutions banishing the Dynasties of the Grand Dukes and annexing the Dukedoms to Piedmont.

DOMESTIC.

Later from California.

The steamship Hebana, Capt. McConnell, she left Minatitlan on the 1st inst., and brings advices from California to the 20th ultimo.

Over 2,000 000 in Treasure.

The steamships Sonora and Cortez, which left to-day for Panama, took out $2,132,000 in treasure, on freight, and 1206 passengers, some of whom go via the Tehuantepec route.

The British ship-of-war Pylades has arrived at this port from Vancouver's, with dispatches for the British Government, to be forwarded by the steamer which sails to day. It is supposed these dispatches relate to the dispute which has arisen in regard to the occupation of the Island of San Juan by the United States troops.

Advices have been received at San Francisco from Vancouver's to the 13th inst. The United States troops still occupied the Island of San Juan.

On the 9th inst., Gen. Harney ordered four companies of the 4th Artillery from Fort Washington, in Washington Territory, to the Island of San Juan, to reinforce Capt. Picket's command.

No British troops had attempted to land on the Island, and the impression prevailed that no effort would be made to disturb the American possession of the Island, or to secure a joint occupation until the matter had been settled diplomatically between the two Governments.

Dispatches from Gen. Harney are expected overlande from Fort Vancouver, to go forward to Washington to-day.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY,

No. Methodist Publishing-house, Nashville,
May 30, 1859.

We intend, as heretofore, to keep a full supply of Books of our own publication at the AGENCY of the Southern Methodist Publishing-house, at New Orleans. J. B. MCFERRIN, Agent.

NOTICE.—Persons having business with the NEW ORLEANS DEPOSITORY, will please direct to KEENER & PARKER.

NOTICE.

BRETHREN OF THE CONFERENCE: We have on hand, at the Depository in Mobile, a good supply of our publications, both of the General Catalogue and of our Sunday-school and Tract issues, which we are anxious to sell. Are you doing for this cause all you might and should? Are your people supplied with books? Would it not improve their piety and advance the interests of the cause of Christ generally, for them to read more? Would it not contribute much to improve and give permanency to the religious character of your young converts, to have them supplied with proper reading? I think, just here is one of our errors. Let us reform and instruct our young people in the doctrine and experience of religion, and thus develop a higher standard of Christian character.

Send us your orders to Bro. J. F. EARLY, he will be glad to fill them. And, as a brother has recently donated a hundred dollars for that purpose, I authorize you to order a few dollars' worth, each, for gratuitous distribution among the poor and ignorant. I expect to receive more donations of the same kind.
